Not thus will intimate records of our own time picture manners and customs for explorers of the past a hundred years hence. Even if any such letters are being written today, which is doubtful, and kept, which is even more doubtful, their ink will be faded past readability and their paper crumbled to shreds in half that time. Our descendants may be commiserated in advance for their loss. For it interests much, thrills a little now and then, illuminates all life somewhat to read these vital, graphic records of so long ago. Mark Hopkins was a lad of promise, so much promise that his uncle, with whom he lived for a long time in his early teens doing chores and farm work because there he could be nearer a school, called him a genius in correspondence with his father, arguing and persuading that Mark should be given a college education, no matter what the cost and the difficulty. Mark finally got it, and so did his two younger brothers—all three of them being highly gifted although in widely different ways—but he won through to his heart's desire, to a medical course and an M. D. degree afterward by virtue of much manual labor on the farm, tutoring in college, teaching in Virginia and in New York City, unswerving purpose and his own innate endowment, but character inspires destiny, and the letters of this young man in his twenties from Virginia and New York make it evident that his destiny will not be that of a country doctor. It is no surprise to the reader of them when his Alma Mater calls him, at 28, to a professorship and presently, in 1836, when he is but 34 years old, chooses him as her president.

Outstanding in interest throughout the volume are the letters of Mark's mother, from the gay and lively one before her marriage, written in 1799 to her brother, in which with humor and high spirits she argues the preferable state of those who bear "the honorable title of old maids" to the long one at the end of the book, fifty years later, full of sprightly and graphic description of a marriage she had just attended. She was a New England farmer's wife and her lifelong environment had been meager in every way, but, throughout, her letters evidenced a humorous outlook on life, a bright, gay spirit, sound common sense, sympathetic understanding especially of her gifted eldest son, and an intellectual endowment much above the average. Some of the most vivid mirrorings in the book of the customs and spirit of the time are in her letters. But all of the letters are rich in that respect. Especially revealing and psychologically significant is the unconscious picture they give every now and then of the people of their period reveling in and exploiting the emotions produced by bereavement. Apparently it was proper a hundred years ago, whatever other emotions were repressed, to indulge in grief and condolence, at least on paper, to the last limit of expression.

On the Trail of Big Game

GIANTS OF THE FOREST. African Hunting Adventures. By W. S. Chadwick. Illustrated. 326 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

AS one of the occupations of a varied life Mr. Chadwick has been, at times, what is rather disdainfully called a pot-hunter. But one reads his book with the growing conviction that this pursuit, when followed among African big game, is not to be disdained by any one seeking thrills or capable of honoring the supremely brave. Since hunting big game is a means of his livelihood, Mr. Chadwick has had to take greater chances, meet worse perils, do more shooting and so see these "giants of the forest" in greater numbers and more savage rôles than do those who hunt for pleasure. That, doubtless, is why his book is so remarkably full of thrilling moments and terrific episodes and wastes so little space on insignificant matters. He devotes his first section to accounts of his experiences with lions and the second to adventures among elephants, hippos, rhinos and buffalo. Another is filled with tales about the various kinds of antelopes, and still another recounts reminiscences of many and most varied experiences in jungle and veldt. Mr. Chadwick has studied the savage life he has hunted and his conclusions differ considerably from the opinions of other writers.

W. R. BURNETT

The young American author who has created two of the most distinctive and appealing fictional figures in years.

COKE in "IRON MAN"
The Book-of-the-Month Club Selection

Coke had the physique of an ox and the blow of a sledge hammer. Coke was too good for a mechanic and "fight manager Regan" sensed it. Under Regan's skillful handling he quickly rose to be champ of the ring and was hailed by the fans as "Iron Man" Mason. "Iron Man" Mason loved fighting and movies but most of all his cheap but pretty, double-crossing wife, Rose. Coke knew the fight game but not women. Regan knew both well, but was helpless. Your sympathy will be with Coke in his game battle to retain his title and the love of his pleasure-mad wife. Coke the honest, honorable, incredibly ignorant and incredibly dumb and defenseless pugilist will walk straight into your heart. Coke the pugilist is one of the most appealing fictional figures of the year. $2.50

RICO in "LITTLE CAESAR"
A Literary Guild Selection

Rico's star rose and fell with meteoric speed. Rico was slight of physique and pale of complexion, but this silent, forceful, fearless racketeer terrorized his way to the top to boss the gang. Hard, cruel and crafty, he ruled with an iron hand, with death or exile for "softies" or betrayers. You will follow Rico with bated breath and with a strange mixture of emotions as he rises to power and influence. A false step by one of his gang, an all-night third-degree confession and Rico is a hunted man with a price on his head. Then the police net closes in on him, and an overwhelming rush of sympathy engulfs you as you take step by step with him in the alley in his desperate fight for freedom and life. Rico, the "Little Caesar" of gangster land, will long dwell in your mind. $2.50

Nearly 200,000 copies of "Iron Man" and "Little Caesar" have been sold. Copies can be had wherever books are sold or from the publishers.

When Coxey's Army Made Its March

COXEY'S ARMY: A Study in Industrial Unrest, 1893-1898. By Donald L. McMurray. Illustrated. 331 pp. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

By CHARLES McD. PUCKETTE

THIS excellent historical study of a picturesque episode affords an interesting contrast. In the present year business slackens, and industrial leaders march upon Washington at the call of the President to mobilize their forces, measured in billions of dollars, for flattening out the dip in the business cycle. Fortunes of individuals have been wiped out in the stock market crash, but actual distress is rare. No voices have been raised to offer economic lunacies as a panacea to prevent recurrences of 1929.

In 1893 distress and want were acute, widespread. The nation was in the grip of an old-fashioned business and financial panic. The sound-money fight had not yet been won. And there were millions to listen to and be convinced by those who preached fiat-money and populistic doctrines: Weaver polled 1,122,045 votes for President in 1892. There marched on Washington in 1894, not captains of industry, but regiments of unemployed. Coxey's Army was the most famous of these; it struggled and straggled from Massillon, Ohio, to the capital. Kelly's Army from the Coast, commandeering freight-train transportation and finally reaching Washington, and Fry's are less well remembered. They were all symptoms of the economic sickness of the United States in those years.

Professor McMurray has reconstructed the setting of that era, retold the narrative of the marches accurately and entertainingly. The decade which ended with 1898 was an unsophisticated one which swallowed much medicine-man and side-show stuff of the kind which Coxey's Army offered. It was impressed by the theatricalities of "the petition in boots," the army which was to tramp to Washington to demand the passage of Coxey's good roads bill and the non-interest-bearing bond bill. It was impressed by the idea of the "Commonweal of Christ," as the plug-hatted soldiers of Coxey's Army were officially named. The religious ideas of Carl Browne, chief lieutenant, to which he converted Coxey, rivaled the leader's economic theories. He believed that the souls of all departed went into a mixture in a great reservoir; that every person born was "a fractional reincarnation of the souls of all who had died before his birth" and that "in himself and Coxey there was reincarnated an exceptionally large quantity of Christ's soul." An observer thought that the predominating reincarnation was that of Balaam's ass.

Coxey's economic heresies, in a time of sharp distress, served with such Christian trimmings, attracted an enormous amount of attention. The newspapers covered the story fu... and not alone for the picturesque side of it. There was a strong feeling that this was a movement which might presage dire political and economic results. The bankers in Wall Street had confidential reports sent them upon the progress of the army. Had not the present generation witnessed the timorous antics of those whom the Socialist or Communist spectre holds in continual fright, it would be difficult to understand the panic of spirit with which some saw Coxey's and Kelly's armies march upon Washington in 1894. They "trembled for the safety of republican institutions." Mrs. Lease, of Kansas of course, a lady Populist, was telling farmers "it was time to quit raising corn and begin raising hell." The smoke from Coxey's Army, however, was that of the fire which nearly elected William Jennings Bryan and the free silverites later.

Jacob Sechler Coxey's program of reform was born of the unemployment of 1893 and his instinct for publicity. It began:

> One dark and rainy night in December, 1891, when Mr. Coxey was driving home from Massillon, floundering in ruts and bottomless mud holes, he realized keenly the need of good roads. Suddenly the idea came to him that the only way to get a good road system was to have the Federal Government build it, and that Congress might exercise its constitutional right to issue money to pay for it. Combining his good-roads policy, his fiat-money ideas, and his desire to aid oppressed humanity by providing work for the unemployed, he developed his plan and embodied it in a bill which was introduced in Congress in 1892.

The army's march came from his genius for publicity; it achieved from one to six columns a day in every newspaper in the United States. The non-interest-bearing bond bill, completing the program, was born on New Year's, 1894. It authorized any State or other political subdivision to issue non-interest-bearing bonds for public improvements. These were to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, who would print legal tender currency in exchange. Coxey's good-roads idea was a generation ahead of his time; his notion that the government should find unemployment for the jobless finds an echo in Washington in 1930; his fiat money ideas belonged to no civilized age.

Profesor MacMurray writes a fair-minded appraisal of the army's character. They were not the "tramps" and criminals which some painted them, but a not unimpressive body of unemployed men actually wanting work. He says:

> But the remarkable thing was not that they made so much trouble but that, under the circumstances, they made so little. When all is said, the story of this much-ridiculed movement is hardly less than a distinct tribute to the capacity for self-government and self-restraint of those American workingmen.

The frightened Washington police stupidly clubbed some of the Coxeyites during the parade when they reached the capital. The encampment in the city finally petered out, and Coxey's Army bore no real fruit of any sort except publicity.

The author also covers adequately the marches of Kelly's and Fry's armies, and of the New England and Eastern variants of these episodes of the 1893-95 hard times. In his final chapters he presents a good summary of the meaning of the Coxey movement. He concludes:

> Coxeyism was important for what it signified rather than for anything it accomplished. The fact that it did not turn out to be dangerous does not mean that it was not worth studying. It was one of the symptoms of the rapidly developing economic revolution in the United States. More specifically, it showed certain reactions of the American frontier spirit to the growing industrialism which was replacing the old order.

And General Coxey, a likable, impressive man, still contributes his economic ideas to the government. He had an interview with President Harding in 1922; he denounces the Federal Reserve act, and regularly proposes that the government print legal tender currency to take care of any need. One other item to complete the picture: he named his infant son Legal Tender Coxey.

This will be a book of 700 pages and will measure 3½ by 5 inches. It will define 48,000 words.

Rum and John Gough

TIGER! TIGER! The Life Story of John B. Gough. By Honore W. Morrow. 296 pp. New York: William Morrow & Co. $2.50.

By FLORENCE FINCH KELLY

It was John B. Gough himself who found in William Blake's poem,

> Tiger, tiger, burning bright,
> In the forests of the night,

which has given Mrs. Morrow the title for her biography, the symbol of the clawing desire which he had to fight all his life. His constant struggle with that tiger, ever "burning bright" within him, with the man sometimes downed by it but with steadily growing powers of control, makes the story of his life one of the most dramatic, emotionally interesting and appealing biographies set before the reading public in many a day. His debauched, neglected boyhood soon wins the sympathy of the reader, who sees him being doubly marked for disaster. A son of bitter poverty, he came to the United States from his English birthplace when only 12 years old, apprenticed to an English farmer who settled in New York State. That was in 1829 and both America and England a hundred years ago were lands of appalling drunkenness. Farmers were quite sure that rum and whisky had to be used in ample quantities to cure the ague, to offset the dangers of drinking water, and for a thousand other reasons, and John's master required him to drink, lest he have a sick boy on his hands. And within a year the child had been delivered over to the claws of the tiger.

At 14 the farmer released him from his apprenticeship and with only fifty cents in his pocket he came to New York to learn bookbinding and try to add what he could to his scanty education. Already a drunkard, as he grew older he sunk deeper and deeper into drink and degradation, making now and then desperate efforts to retrieve himself, sometimes winning for a time to sobriety, self-respect and temporary comfort, only to be soon helpless again under the mauling of the tiger. Once he locked himself in his room with some bread and herrings and an ample supply of water, threw the key out of the window and battled with the beast for six days. For months after that he thought he had won the fight, and then a physician gave him for some illness a medicine containing ether. He took the prescribed dose, one teaspoonful—and the tiger was upon him again. He stared at the bottle, drained it, rushed out of the house and took the first train to the city where he was soon deep in a drunken debauch that lasted almost a week, and was followed by another desperate struggle. He was 26, had attained fame as a temperance lecturer, had married happily and believed he had won his long fight when a man spoke to him on the street, pretended old acquaintance and mutual friends, and asked John to join him in a drink of soda water. But there was gin in the drink and some potent drug, and in a few minutes John Gough was rushing from one saloon to another, drinking in every one. The week of drunken debauch that followed was the last victory of the tiger, although it menaced him till the end of his days. Mrs. Morrow tells how, more than forty years later, he attended a communion service, the first in many years, at which wine was used, and then:

> As the silver cup was raised to his lips and the biting fragrance of the wine stung his nostrils, he went blind with desire. It required superhuman effort to put the cup aside untasted. And long after the last communicant had left the church he knelt at the altar rail wrestling with the tiger.

The story of John B. Gough's life is the story of a battle to the death, in many rounds, between man and tiger, with the beast finally vanquished, and Mrs. Morrow tells it with thrilling effect. But there is more than this in the story, or her subject would not have been the famous man that he was for more than four decades in both America and England. She makes the reader realize his marvelous powers as an orator and appreciate his ability to sway his huge audiences as he liked. His great gifts, evidently, were closely akin to the actor's genius, and she is probably right when she says that with a different environment in childhood and youth he might have been among the most famous of the sons of the theatre. She tells charmingly the story of his quaint, romantic courtship, by which he won so gifted and steadfast a helpmate, and there are interesting glimpses of his mother, a nervous, high-strung, ambitious woman, rather shrill and narrow, but having personality and a vaulting spirit that carried her vision far above the squalid poverty that pinned her down. From her and her influence came all that was best and finest in her son. The running pictures of life in this country during the thirties, forties, fifties and later make a colorful and interesting background for the dramatic story that she portrays against it. Across it move many of the famous men and women of the last century whose stories were more or less linked with that of Gough. There is a vivid account of the effort of the temperance reformers to induce Lincoln, in 1862, not to sign the revenue bill that would license the liquor traffic, in order to provide funds that the government sorely needed, and of how he cried out to them in a voice that "shook the crystal chandeliers like a trumpet blast, 'though I must call on the very powers of Hades for help, I must save the Union!'" Most important of all and receiving the most attention, because Gough was so much a part of it, is the graphic and dramatic portrayal of the steady rise of the temperance movement, its marvelous growth, its division into different streams of influence and activity and the part that Gough took in the phases of the cause which he espoused. There is also edifying mention every now and then of the abuse of Gough that seethed in talk and print and the names that he was called—all of it so like the customs of our own day!

Mrs. Morrow has been a novelist so long that she does not yet realize that the biographer has some obligations from which the writer of fiction is free. Chief of them is his duty to assure the reader of the dependability of his narrative. Presumably she has gone to Gough's autobiography for her facts. But the reader who is not already somewhat familiar with the social and temperance history of the last century has no means of knowing how much of the moving story she tells is fact and how much of it she has vivified and embroidered out of her imagination. For her method is that of the popular up-to-date writer of biography who casts his narrative in fiction-like form. It is a method that makes for interest and vividness, but it does not quite play fair with the reader who prefers to know which are the fairy stories and which are not.

Evidence of the power of the written word—if it happens to be the right word—is found in a story which John North, author of "Patricia Lacks a Lover," tells about himself. While he was training in England as a Second Lieutenant North wearied of the usual phrase "clean and tidy" in the orderly officer's report, and one day he varied it by stating that the guard room was in "impeccable condition." When the Adjutant saw the report he said: "Gosh! This fellow must be educated. Send him to the signal school." And so John North escaped the infantry, where in those days a Second Lieutenant's chances of coming back all in one piece were very slim indeed. Mr. North's new novel, "Unmarried Life," is published by Duffield & Co.

DOWN IN THE VALLEY

By H. W. FREEMAN

THE tremendous success last year of JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN is likely to be eclipsed by Mr. Freeman's new novel. For here, he has a situation fraught with drama and emotional appeal. He takes a successful young business man, who impulsively purchases a run-down farm in a beautiful Suffolk valley. The tug of the soil is only one phase of this tremendous story. The country people, particularly two sharply contrasted women, their effect upon the life and viewpoint of the city man, his rapid assimilation in the whole life and welfare of the community are unfolded with power and rare skill. The story begins swiftly and carries you through a colorful and ever interesting tale, with a climax quite unexpected and unusual. $2.50

Mystery Stories

THE BODY IN THE SAFE. By Cecil Freeman Gregg. 304 pp. New York: The Dial Press. $2.

THE chief character in this book is a clever and audacious international crook who is known to the police of two hemispheres as Slick Smith. The sobriquet, "Glick" is well-earned, for not only does the bearer of it commit crime after crime with impunity, but he goes out of his way to bamboozle the best minds of Scotland Yard for no apparent reason except to show his contempt for them and to prove that their wits are no match for his. Eventually he is caught, but his capture is no credit to the detectives. The story of his adventures makes an entertaining yarn, but even the most rabid anti-Britisher will find it difficult to believe that the sleuths of Scotland Yard are so easily fooled as the final episode of the book makes out.

To Inspector Collins of the local police the death of Sir Giles Gillespie looked like an accident. Letters left by Sir Giles indicated suicide. But Anthony Slade of Scotland Yard was sure that Sir Giles had been murdered. Later on both Collins and Slade modify their views, but they never come to complete agreement. The plot of this story is exceedingly complicated, but the telling of it is marred by a too-wordy exposition of the mental processes of the detective. Few readers care to listen in on a detective's arguments with himself as to the meaning of this or that bit of evidence. Such digressions slow up the story, and that is the unforgivable sin.

It is evident from the beginning that there is some connection between the various murders with which the story deals, but what that connection is puzzles the Scotland Yard detectives. No small part of their puzzlement is due to their jumping to the wrong conclusion in the first case in which there seems to be any hope of establishing a motive. There are eleven murders in the book, and the detectives barely succeed in preventing the twelfth. The motive, which is at the same time the connecting link, is an unusual one in detective fiction, although it is by no means unique, as the author appears to believe it to be. The same general idea was, if we are not mistaken, handled much more skillfully by John Rhode in one of his Dr. Priestly stories.

THE DEATH MASK. By Arthur Applin. 336 pp. New York: Duffield & Co. $2.

People of the stage and of high and low society in London are the characters in this story of much crime and little mystery. It is no trick at all to discover who are the villains of the piece, but it is a little more difficult to account for the peculiar actions of the girl who has a face like a famous death mask. A little frankness on her part might have saved a lot of trouble. But then, her lack of that quality, together with the unconventionality of her first entrance upon the scene, should help to put the story over once it reaches its predestined screen production.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE OPERA GODS

On Both Sides of the Atlantic Grand Opera Feels the Effects of the "Mechanical Age," While the Dearth of Great Composers and Singers Greatly Increases the Difficulties of Impresarios

The Decline of Grand Opera in "The Age of Mechanization."

By T. R. YBARRA

GRAND opera is on the decline. Composers of the present day fail almost invariably in their attempts to compose operas capable of maintaining their place in the regular repertory. Singers are not what they used to be. The lure of the radio, the general "mechanization" and materialism of our day—all these are contributing to a decrease in the size of audiences in opera houses.

Evidence of the truth of the above assertions is piling up on both sides of the Atlantic. Prominent among those vouching for it is a man eminently qualified to speak on the grand opera situation in America as well as in Europe—Giulio Gatti-Casazza, for the past twenty-one seasons general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company here in New York, and before that director of the Scala Theatre of Milan, one of the most renowned homes of the lyric drama.

Recently the editor of the Corriere della Sera of Milan, Italy's best-known newspaper, asked Signor Gatti-Casazza to give his views on the crisis. In his reply the director of the Metropolitan wrote that he attributed it largely to the fact that almost all of the new operas lacked vitality because of the lack of genius of their composers and to the fact that the old operas required singers of greater ability than that possessed by most of those of today, since the latter, even when endowed with sufficiently good voices, seldom have the necessary personality for making a deep impression on audiences.

In a talk a few days ago at his office in the Metropolitan Opera House Signor Gatti-Casazza amplified these opinions.

"The crisis in grand opera began twenty years ago and has been growing steadily more acute," he said. "The age of mechanization in which we are living is not favorable to any form of art, including that of the opera.

"It is a strange thing for an operatic impresario to say, but I must admit that it looks almost as if the world thought nowadays that it could get along without grand opera.

"The principal reason for the crisis is the lack of new composers. Opera, like all other forms of art, must evoke emotions—sensations. Otherwise it must necessarily be a failure. The old composers of opera succeeded in their works because of a combination of genius and sincerity. Most of the moderns lack both these qualities. As a rule they possess an excellent technical knowledge of music, but they have nothing to say.

"In addition to the lack of new composers, there is also a dearth today of great operatic singers.

"Still another reason for the decline of grand opera is the increase of general knowledge of music among the public. In former times the opera was somewhat of a mystery; the only way to learn much about it was for a person to go to performances in the opera houses of the world. Now, however, the radio brings to many homes the voices of operatic singers and the music of operatic composers, so an increasing number of people, becoming familiar in this way with grand opera, stay away from the theatre.

"In this age progress is almost entirely along technical lines. We are doing wonders in aviation, in the construction of submarines, in all sorts of mechanical things. But where are the great works of sculpture of our day, and the great paintings, and the great novels? They are not to be found, and neither are the great operas of this age."

Another prominent personage in the grand opera field, also well known to Americans, is as pessimistic as Signor Gatti-Casazza about the situation. This is Amelita Galli-Curci, the prima donna of the famous top notes, who retired from opera a few weeks ago in order to devote herself to concert work. In her valedictory to the career which brought her worldwide celebrity she said:

"Opera is very old-fashioned entertainment for 1930. The whole world, particularly the Italians, are losing interest in it."

Shortly before Galli-Curci's swan-song, another prima donna, Mme. Alda, after singing for twenty-two seasons at the Metropolitan Opera House, announced that she too intended to leave the operatic stage. In her case the radio was responsible. Broadcasting, according to Mme. Alda, has practically sounded the knell of extended concert tours by opera singers, besides causing havoc in the status of opera itself.

"It is the old law of supply and demand," said Mme. Alda. "When people can sit in comfort in their homes and hear the great works of the masters sung by those whom they love to hear without any more trouble than turning on their radio sets, naturally the demand for opera, especially in provincial opera houses, fast disappears. Radio is just beginning, but it is growing by leaps and bounds, while the glory of the opera in this country is fading out."

From the ranks of male stars the latest to forsake the opera is that renowned baritone, Titta Ruffo. Henceforth he intends to devote himself to the sound

The Alexander Hamilton Institute

ANNOUNCES

New Executive Training for men who want to be independent in the next five years

Modern Business

THE next five years in American business will offer more opportunity and more danger than any similar period for a long time.

More men will achieve independence. More men who might achieve it will fail because of a failure properly to analyze the facts.

A right program will be more profitable than it has ever been. A wrong decision will be far more costly.

To put it in other words, the organization of business, the tempo of business, the speed of business are all in process of rapid change. The evidence is everywhere. In a brief period of thirty days between October 15th and November 15th, 1929, thousands of men who supposed that they were secure for life found themselves suddenly ruined. Thousands had their confidence so shaken that they are dazed and wondering. They have no plan. "What will happen to business in the next few years?" they are asking. "What program should we lay out for ourselves?"

The Institute foresaw the trend

Two years ago the Alexander Hamilton Institute, from its nation-wide contact with business leaders, sensed the tremendous changes which were about to come, and began to make preparations to meet them.

The Institute's original Course and Service in business was a great Course and did a great work. More than 398,000 men made it a part of their business equipment, and are far ahead because they did.

But the Institute saw that revolutionary changes were in prospect. Little business units were being merged into big units. Industries were reaching out into foreign markets. Security prices were about to become subject to a whole new set of conditions. Production methods were being revolutionized. The sales organization and strategy of the past were entirely unfitted for the new competition. The responsibilities of guiding the new business could not be discharged by men whose training had been in the old.

The Institute said: "We must prepare a wholly new Course to meet the new conditions. We must engage the co-operation of authorities whose business success belongs to the present, and not to the past. They must be the biggest and most successful men of the present—the men who will be the leaders during the coming five years."

Without regard to cost, the Institute went out to enlist the co-operation of the nation's business leaders. The response was even beyond its most sanguine expectations. In effect, one and all these men said:

"The greatest need of all is for trained leadership. Count on us. Any contribution we can make to this New Executive Training will be a contribution to our own best interests, because it will furnish us with more of the sort of executives we need."

It is impossible in this page to give detailed facts about the New Course and Service. It is new from start to finish—so new that the latter part will not be entirely off the presses for some months. Every unit will come to you fresh and live and breathing—straight from the very inner sanctums of this new business world.

We invite you to send for the full facts in a new book entitled: "What an Executive Should Know." It is a booklet that should be read by every man who expects to win a secure place for himself in the next five years. It is well worth an hour of your time. And it is free.

Send for your copy today. You cannot gain a proper perspective on what lies ahead unless you look at the picture through the eyes of the country's biggest men.

movies, since the new medium, as he sees it, gives the artist a better chance to "put himself across."

And so it goes. Stars of the opera forsake it, one by one; audiences dwindle, lovers of the opera lament, its foes sneer and gloat, experts seek to diagnose the causes of the "crisis," optimists rush into print with suggested remedies.

From several European countries where, for many years, grand opera has been one of the staples of dramatic entertainment, come reports leaving no doubt that there is indeed an opera "crisis" and a grave one.

The Italians, to whom opera has always given an enjoyment such as most people of more northerly climes cannot understand and much less share, are for the first time showing indifference toward the operatic art. Milan, classical centre of Italian opera, is cold-shouldering its favorite form of entertainment and the situation in smaller Italian cities is such as to bear out what Mme. Galli-Curci has said.

A MUSICAL correspondent living in Milan, who follows closely operatic developments there and elsewhere in Italy, wrote recently that the Italian public "absents itself systematically" from Italian opera houses and is "only occasionally allured by the attraction of a more or less legitimately celebrated name or by some curiosity apart from the value of the performance offered." In Italy, nowadays, he went on, one is confronted with "opera seasons which close, almost without exception, with notable deficits, the reduction to a minimum of Autumn and Winter opera seasons and the reduction of the duration and importance of those in the larger towns."

"The public no longer loves the opera," he concludes. "Its love, where it still exists, is a passionless, unenthusiastic affection; it is a feeling which has become a habit for something which no longer affects us deeply, which we continue to love because it would be painful for us to take the initiative of detaching ourselves from it completely; but, if tomorrow we found it gone from beside us, our sorrow would perhaps be brief and mild. The Italian public—operagoers if ever there were any—no longer feels that transport which caused it for more than a century to neglect, and perhaps even to forget, every other manifestation of musical art.

The same sort of thing is true of Germany, another land of operalovers, if the laments of many observers there are to be taken at their face value. There, also, attendance at operatic performances seems to be dropping off; the most frantic efforts of impresarios to lure the Germans into their theatres are constantly meeting with failure. One of the most distinguished of German operatic conductors, Bruno Walter, expressed himself recently at considerable length on the crisis.

"It is no secret to any one capable of looking beneath the surface of our time," said Herr Walter, "that we are in the midst of a 'culture crisis' which, naturally, affects the opera. I should like to point out, as one of the symptoms, that the mood of today undoubtedly is, in general, turning away from the beautiful things of life. I don't need to explain how dangerous such a prevailing attitude is to such a definitely composed form of art as the opera.

"The position of the opera is something like that of a vessel that must steam through a storm with damaged engines and diminished steering power."

Another German, an operatic critic living in Berlin, is no less gloomy as he casts his eye over the situation.

"That an operatic crisis exists here is a known fact," he wails. "There is also a crisis in operatic attendance. We no longer have a real, unified operagoing public, a group upon which this strangest, most heavily conditioned and complicated of all forms of stage presentation may count with any degree of certainty. We have our operas by Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Strauss, but strictly speaking we have no 'opera.'

WE in Germany became an operatic people through Mozart, Weber and Wagner. But just as we were not operatic before Mozart's 'Zauberflöte,' the time may be near at hand when we shall cease to be. Of course, we will cherish our treasures of the past; we shall still have opera houses which, to a certain extent, will be 'museums' and in which operas will be performed before a constantly shifting public; but we shall no longer have 'opera.'

"The situation of the German opera stage is most baffling. The Händel and Verdi renaissance is only a proof that vital new compositions are lacking not only in Germany but all over the world."

As evidence of the truth of the above statement the results of a recent investigation of the operatic situation may be submitted. Of seventy-four grand operas figuring in the regular répertoire here and abroad, it was found that fifty-five—or just short of 75 per cent of the total—were composed fifty or more years ago. Of the remainder, seventeen were composed in the quarter of a century between 1880 and 1905—a mere 30 per cent of the number composed before that date—and, of all the legion of operas turned out by composers from 1905 onward, only two have succeeded in establishing themselves in the regular repertory. These two are Richard Strauss's "Rosenkavalier," first produced in 1911, and Montemezzi's "L'Amore dei Tre Re," dating from 1913. As a matter of fact, it might even be said that "Rosenkavalier" is the sole opera to have won a place for itself in the regular repertory since the advent of "Madame Butterfly" in 1904, since it may be argued that the Montemezzi opera is not really firmly established there.

In any case, whether the number of works composed in the last twenty-five years which have succeeded in maintaining themselves in popular favor be placed at one or two, the discrepancy disclosed between the state of affairs in the present era and the earlier days of grand opera is certainly striking. Summed up, it shows that of seventy-four operas in the regular repertory 75 per cent were composed before 1880, 22 per cent before 1905 and 3 per cent since 1905.

Whereas at various stages in the earlier history of grand operas one might point to a number of living composers whose works were in the regular operatic répertoire, today (if Montemezzi be omitted) there are only two—Richard Strauss and Pietro Mascagni. And it may be truthfully said that the latter really belongs to the past, since, despite the fact that he has turned out opera after opera during his lifetime with untiring diligence and pathetic hopefulness, the only one of his numerous works which has kept its place in the repertory is "Cavalleria Rusticana," composed a full forty years ago.

OF all the operatic composers who may be classed as belonging to our own day, only one has succeeded in putting more than one opera into the regular repertory. This fortunate man is the late Giacomo Puccini, who enriched the repertory with four works which, popular for many years, show no signs of forfeiting the public esteem which they won at the very outset of their existence. The four works in question are "Manon Lescaut" (1893), "Bohème" (1896), "Tosca" (1900) and "Madame Butterfly" (1904). The Frenchman Jules Massenet lived until 1912, but the operas by him which have maintained themselves in the repertory were all composed in the early '90s or before. "Manon," the greatest favorite of all the Massenet operas, dates back to 1884.

As further evidence of how striking is the failure of present-day operatic composers to produce works capable of staying in the repertory, it may be pointed out that in the years immediately preceding 1905 there was nothing like the dearth in the production of such works that is characteristic of the years since then. Between 1890 and 1905 the following operas now in the regular repertory on both sides of the Atlantic were composed: Mascagni's "Cavalleria" (1890), Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" (1890), Massenet's "Werther" (1892) and "Thaïs" (1894), Verdi's "Falstaff" (1893), Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" (1893), Charpentier's "Louise" (1900) and Debus-

LUDWIG SURVEYS THE SCENE IN PALESTINE

British soldiers who stood beside their horses, ready to mount. They were young, mostly handsome, blonde, well equipped, busy with saddles, boots and arms, obviously indifferent to the place in which they were stationed for daily duty. As they stood there, a few steps from the so-called Marie's Well, between busily passing Jews and a worthy sheik behind whose donkey the heavily laden wife struggled along afoot, they were just like the Romans who had stood on the same spot and watched the same passing figures 2,000 years before—ostensibly to maintain order. There was no Suez Canal then, but there was an empire to protect. M. Briand was right when he said lately to one of the Zionist leaders: "Though everything seems confused in Palestine, one thing is certain—the British have no intention of leaving it."

LEAVING aside the question of their general policy, the fact remains that not only the Jews and the Arabs but also the British have made mistakes. The greatest was that, according to the unanimous judgment of neutral observers, nearly all the officials, with the exception of the half-dozen highest, have constantly found themselves in more or less silent opposition to the Jews. The reason for this attitude, of which many examples are related, is to be found in the natural habit of Colonial officials to deal more perfunctorily with so-called natives than with those very independent Jewish immigrants who have minds of their own. Even with 12,000 soldiers on hand, the Arabian disturbances of 1921 were not checked at their inception, because the execution of many orders was handicapped by the resistance of the officials.

On this occasion also the sudden attack of 6,000 Arabs upon the twenty-two Jews living in the village was characterized by the government as a "clash" of two races, and no fines were imposed upon the villagers for the pogrom. The Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Deeds, speaking at a London meeting, summed up the situation in a sentence by saying that he knew superior officials in Palestine who had never read the Balfour Declaration.

The execution of the British policy requires time; and if the Jews, who throughout their history have surely shown a bit of patience, manage as a whole to bear up, individuals perhaps do not always do so. Hence the biting remark of a British official who replied to an urgent request from a Zionist leader by saying, "You have waited 2,000 years; wait a few more." With this attitude may be contrasted the wisdom of a fellah in the north of Judea with whom I conversed through an interpreter friend. Dressed in his brown blouse, he stood behind his two black buffaloes and hammered upon his wooden plow. After replying reluctantly to my questions, he said suddenly:

"If they kill a thousand Jews, millions more will come to avenge their brothers. If they kill a thousand Arabs, there are millions of others to avenge them, too. Then why do they kill each other?"

Even to the cadence in which it was spoken, this observation of the Arabian peasant resembled the answer of a Jewish scribe. This poor fellah came nearer to the solution of the question than all the politicians among the three interested peoples with whom I talked in Jerusalem.

For only by mutual understanding can the Arabs and the Jews live together in this country, which both races possess by virtue of tradition and by virtue of promises given in recognition of their conduct during the World War. No prudent Zionist speaks any longer of the Jewish State of Palestine, but all speak of a home in Palestine. The first would be as senseless as the published assertion of the Arabs that Sir Alfred Mond and Einstein wanted to erect again the Temple of David. Deriving an advantage from their position here as executors of a great part of the conscience of the world, the British must also shoulder the difficulties.

When in 1753 the emancipation of the Jews met with such passionate opposition in England that it had to be immediately rescinded, there appeared an anonymous book, a copy of which a friend of mine recently discovered in the British Museum. In it the writer sought to prove by the Bible, first that the Jews were destined to assemble again one day in Palestine, second that the inhabitants of the British Isles would help them to do so, and third that this action would bring happiness and prosperity to the British themselves—the whole argument laden in the most curious way with Biblical quotations.

This prophecy seems, at least in part, to be on the way to fulfilment. The holy places, for which the League of Nations long has desired to set up a commission (why not entrust the decision to Lord Cecil?), have placed this bit of land in a special category. No Christian State would sanction turning the Church of the Holy Sepulchre over to the Arabs alone. In view of the composition of the population and of the treaties, it would be equally impossible to give the land exclusively to the Jews. Nor can there be any apprehension of its coming under the dominion of a Jewish majority; for even if they had the permission to come and if there were room enough, not one-fourth of the 16,000,000 Jews in the world would settle in Palestine. There are not 10,000 Western Jews in Palestine today.

But millions manifest their interest by lending encouragement and sending money in order, by the establishment of a small, well-ordered and protected home upon an ancient site, to show the world that here a haven beckons to the persecuted. If there were no anti-semitism, the Jews would need no Palestine. Just as millions were touched by the dispute over the Wailing Wall, although only a few hundred aged Jews, including scarcely any Zionists, pray upon the spot where these sacred stones lie, so the 16,000,000 Jews were stirred by the idea of Palestine without themselves needing or seeking Palestine.

Propriety alone enjoins that each acknowledge the race from which he comes, be it ever so remote, when that race is calumniated or assailed. Millions of Germans living abroad, whose loyalty to the land of their origin had long since become attenuated, were aroused anew when Germany faced danger and finally defeat. The case of the Jews today, I know, is not a parallel one, but it is somewhat analogous. Even though they are destined to remain in the minority there, the newly established centre represents an ideal toward which, from far and wide, so many eyes are turned. It would not be to Britain's interest, nor would it be possible for the League of Nations to withdraw the protecting hand and to deliver them to the caprices of a less advanced race.

But as the Jew, when belonging to a handicapped minority, nevertheless utilized his talents to notable effect in many spheres, he will never be the oppressed, even if he has only a third of the votes in the prospective "parliament" of Palestine which, in the long run, in some preliminary form, will be inevitable. For his character and his history show that the Jew was born to be neither lord nor vassal. Independent and inventive, he has learned actively to adapt himself to circumstances. This he will do here, where history summons him, and he will know how to create a symbolic centre for a dispersed people.

COLOR SENSE OF THE INSECTS

BLUE is the most and red is the least attractive coloring to insects, according to the conclusions reached by Dr. Frederic E. Clements and Dr. Frances L. Long after many years of research at the Pike's Peak Laboratory of the Carnegie Institution of Washington to find out why insects are attracted to some flowers and not to others.

Many artificial flowers can be manufactured realistically today, but they would never fool the bee or butterfly. The scientific workers concluded that the most cunningly prepared flower by human hands can have no attraction for an insect. On the other hand, if real blossoms on a living branch are placed among the artificial flowers, the bees and the other insects will invariably seek them out.

Dr. Clements and Dr. Long, during their researches, had some natural flowers painted with water colors and they found that the insects visited these as often as the unpainted ones. When bright-colored petals were reduced by one-half the visitors fell off to numbers ranging from a tenth to a half.

Blue is apparently is such favor with these creatures that even when blue flowers were turned upside down they sought them out as readily as if they had been upright. Some insects, however, including the bumble bees, were baffled by the new position, some finding it hard to master the problem of turning upside down to sip the nectar.

Dr. Clements and Dr. Long believe that insects are drawn to flowers by both color and odor and are guided both by form and such markings as stripes and dots. While fragrance will attract from a distance, color holds its appeal only within a distance of thirty feet. Bees seem to have the best memories and they will remember not only the best places for the flowers they desire but also colors, odors and shapes.

A PORTRAIT OF THE NEW CHIEF JUSTICE

Mr. Hughes, Who Would Rather Be Clear Than Clever, Has Been the Centre of Many Dramatic Situations

By HAROLD PHELPS STOKES

THE appointment of Charles Evans Hughes as Chief Justice of the United States caps a public career of extraordinary range and significance. To look at him, or to talk with him, or to read about his early life, you would not suspect that this son of a Baptist minister, a plodding professor of law for some years before the insurance investigation pitched him into public life, was destined for any such rôle as fate had in store for him.

Yet Mr. Hughes's career has been nothing if not dramatic, from the moment when he so greatly relieved the minds of the reactionary bosses of New York State by accepting a post on the Supreme Court. Some of his friends felt at that time that where the court had gained they had lost a great leader. It looked to them as if he had entered a monastery. Then, suddenly, after six years he resigned from the court to accept the Republican nomination for the Presidency. It hardly seems fourteen years ago that that ill-omened campaign marched to its extraordinary conclusion on the night when Mr. Hughes went to bed thinking himself President-elect and woke up the next morning a private citizen.

The incident would appeal to the philosophers no less than to the historians. Few men are called upon in the course of their mortal careers to suffer so bitter a disappointment. It did not embitter Mr. Hughes. Rather, it served, as hard blows had served his New England ancestors, to strengthen his character, and perhaps to broaden his understanding and sympathy. For five years he resumed the practice of law. Then he returned to the public life of Washington as Secretary of State in the Cabinet of Warren Harding, ready for that dramatic entry on the world's stage when he rose at the opening session of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments to propose the sinking of the ships of war.

Many observers felt that it was a new Hughes they were watching. His inheritance and his training were austere, and in his early public life his presence partook of that austerity. More than one of his pristine biographers—perhaps their vision lacked penetration—got the impression of waves beating on a stern and rockbound coast. "He was a stiff, unyielding figure, and on the rare occasions when he tried to unbend he almost audibly creaked. A frosty man, a just man, and clearly and discernibly an able man."

PERHAPS that was the aspect he wore in 1910. By 1921 the frost had thawed. Instead of embittering him, his disappointments had apparently mellowed him. He was genial, debonair almost. The very cut of his beard had changed. "Why, Governor, you've bobbed it!" Al Smith remarked at a Gridiron dinner they both attended. He no longer looked like a circuit rider or a Mormon elder. And, unlike some who have filled the office before and since, he was happy in his work. He brought to it an extraordinary zest, a contagious enthusiasm. He was a fresh and lively figure in the mid-Victorian setting of the State, War and Navy Building across the way from the White House. Washington did not know quite what to make of him at first. One of the correspondents sent this rather unconventional dispatch about him:

> Washington, April 22.—This man Charles E. Hughes has started out all wrong, in the opinion of old-timers here. His course with regard to the German note yesterday confirms their judgment. The new Secretary of State does not seem to have the remotest notion that red tape, procrastination and a refusal ever to be prepared in advance for contingencies are three cardinal virtues of a bureaucrat.
> Why, he acts so fast he's got the correspondents running circles around the State Department trying to keep up. A messenger arrived with a cable in his hat from Dr. Simons, asking the United States to umpire between the Germans and the Allies. Mr. Hughes tells him to sit down outside a minute and wait for the answer. The secretary writes out his reply in the form of a night letter to the Germans, saying "Nothing doing. Play ball!", calls up the President and tells him about it, gives it to the messenger, and turns to Mexico, Yap or Panama.
> No delay, no red tape; not even file copies. Poor Mr. Fletcher has to get some typewritten copies out later in the afternoon and carry them around to the Embassies so that the Ambassadors won't faint when they read the news in the paper the next morning.
> It's all very disconcerting. The fundamental trouble seems to be that Mr. Hughes thinks things out beforehand. He seems to have studied out the international situation so thoroughly that he knows how to meet any emergency head-on. That quality of foresight and quick decision would be all very well in a chief of staff, but of course it's terribly out of place in a Secretary of State.

Colby liked to be clever. Hughes liked to be clear. The correspondents sometimes came away from his predecessor's press conferences bewildered. They always came away from the Hughes's conferences with a feeling of having been breathing ozone. Of course, that was all part of his policy. He had a program, and he knew that with the Senate still bitter over Wilson and the League, he could not hope to put it through without public support. He determined to get that support, and succeeded. He talked to the country daily, taking the people into his confidence as far as he could. "He makes foreign relations hold front pages with the Stillman divorce case," the author of the "Mirrors of Washington" said of him.

There is no more ticklish job than handling the press at a time when one is conducting international negotiations. Experience does not make a man a master of the art. Harding, a newspaper publisher, was a failure at it. Colonel House at Paris was far more skillful, although in the end his efforts came to naught. Hughes was a wizard at it and his efforts bore fruit.

One has only to look back over those years to realize how formidable a task it was that he undertook. They were the years which marked the collapse of the Wilson program for world peace. Mr. Hughes himself had been one of the famous thirty-one Republicans who, in the campaign of 1920, had signed a public statement declaring that the best way into a League of Nations was through the instrumentality of the Republican party. It has been said, somewhat cynically, that those who signed that declaration must have been either fools or knaves. Certainly the verdict at the polls was not generally interpreted as an indorsement of the League. Even Mr. Hughes did not so interpret it. Under the circumstances his relations both with the irreconcilables of the Senate and the internationalists of the League movement were somewhat strained.

But he was always something of a realist, and he proved himself one at Washington both in method and in purpose. He set as his goal the largest practicable measure of international cooperation, with the emphasis on "practicable." He preached the doctrine of enlightened self-interest. The interests of the United States demanded that she abandon her policy of aloofness. There are those who believe that Hughes, committed as he was by his published statement in the campaign, should have gone much further in this direction. He would no doubt plead that he went as far as he could. History will surely record that the treaties that grew out of that conference, his persistent advocacy of our entry into the World Court, his subsequent service on that court and his work in the interest of Pan-American comity were all notable contributions to the cause of peace and good-will.

One of the secrets of his success is his self-confidence. One day when he was Secretary of State, a group of neophytes in the consular service filed into his outer office to get a word of inspiration from their chief for the careers on which they were about to embark. "The man who succeeds in his work in any position where there are a great many burdens and demands," Mr. Hughes told them, "is the man who can keep quiet and placid when there is very severe pressure, who can keep his head and intelligence, at the same time giving the impression of a man adequate to the exigency."

That is a good description of Hughes himself. He has a way of keeping in the best of humor under very severe pressure, and of "giving the impression of a man adequate to the exigency." It is a fine round phrase, very characteristic of Mr. Hughes. He likes to talk about the exigencies of a situation. Long years before, in a talk up at Yale when he was still Governor of New York, he had painted another portrait of the man who, like himself, chose a public career:

> The true political leader must be a man of sympathy and quick perception. He should have political insight and foresight. He must be swift to detect the movement of public opinion and the exigencies of conditions. He should understand how to relate the prior action of his party to the next appropriate step in the line of its general policy which will commend the party to public approval and justify continued confidence. He should not wait to be driven by public indignation. In the forwarding of measures or the shaping of issues he should never forget that the final test will be the public interest, and that while he may move within the broad limits assigned to him by the traditions of his party, public service must ever be the highest party expediency and that public injury is an ineffaceable stain upon the party record.

ALTHOUGH each has much of the other's endowment in this respect, Hoover connotes energy, Hughes brains. The ordinary man or woman has occasional moments

When the eye sinks inward and the heart lies plain,
And what we mean we say, and what we would we know.

To Hughes these moments are not rare. His thought is as limpid as a stream, and between it and utterance there is no fleshy barrier. He is never at a loss for a word or a phrase. They drop from his lips perfectly selected and well-ordered. One of his biographers wrote of him at the time of the Washington conference: "He never hesitates. He never says, 'I must think about that.' He has thought about it." Another contemporary observer put the same idea in a little different way when he spoke of Mr. Hughes as having "a grasp of facts so dynamic that it is constantly projecting itself over into future contingencies."

He emerged from the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments a world figure. Those who had sat about the table with him at Washington were impressed with his fairness. He was far removed from the atmosphere of intrigue which so often prevails at European gatherings. His informal notion of the object of American diplomacy was "a fair deal all around, with the United States sitting in for what it is entitled to."

The stark metaphor admirably combined a lawyer's sense of his client's rights with the realism which Mr. Hughes chose as his guiding principle. "The failures of others may have taught him that the shortest way to attain a lofty end is not always to proclaim its loftiness in advance," the late Lord Northcliffe remarked of the American Secretary's diplomacy. "He may have learned that the presence of a spice of self-interest, national or individual, is often helpful in persuading men of worth and of ethical principles."

ARCHAEOLOGY SHEDS NEW LIGHT ON THE BIBLE

that a lamb might be substituted in sacrifice for the life of a man. It was this very substitution that Abraham achieved.

Bitter, therefore, were the internecine conflicts by which these fearful obsessions were exorcised. An Egypt, developed by laborers in bondage, has been revealed through archaeology, and the Pharoah of the oppression is history. On Mount Sinai, impossible to mistake as the massive throne from which the Ten Commandments were promulgated, inscriptions have been discovered, inclusive, apparently, of Egyptian hieroglyphics of the Mosaic period. According to one reading, they include a sentence in which the lawgiver describes his rescue as a babe from the waters of the Nile, but it should be added that the interpretation is disputed. On the other hand, a parasitic deposit on the tamarisks has been noticed which really seems to correspond to the descriptions of manna.

One great find may await the antiquarian. At death Joseph was honored with all the usual Egyptian ceremonial except actual burial. His body was borne by the Israelites to Canaan and there entombed. If that sepulchre could be discovered, with its Egyptian sarcophagus and writings, one or two doubts would be resolved.

Of Joshua's invasion we may now trace the masterly strategy. Jericho by the Jordan is, of course, a fact, and the collapse of a former Jericho has been demonstrated. The only question here is whether the city was not in ruins before Joshua arrived, a moot point in chronology.

There is a stirring passage in which we read how Joshua smote a stronghold called Hazor with the edge of the sword, so that "there was not any left to breathe"; how he burned Hazor with fire and utterly destroyed it. At the junction of the roads from Sidon and Damascus, Hazor has been uncovered, a commanding and strategic site.

SHILOH, too, where Samuel served in the Tabernacle, is under scrutiny, and there has been found, not, indeed, the Ark of the Covenant, which has been removed to Jerusalem, but a much later but still most ancient Byzantine church. At Mizpeh, across the Jordan, where Jacob and Laban set up their pillar with the words, "The Lord be between me and thee," where, moreover, Samuel as judge presided over the earliest of assize courts, there has been a curious discovery. It is a kind of underground silo with a false bottom, not far from a wine press, and intended to defeat the tax-gatherers. In the days of Samuel "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" and the laws were still difficult to enforce.

The rampart of Jerusalem from which the Jebusites jeered at David's mighty men has been uncovered; also the watercourse or tunnel and well up which Joab climbed in order to capture the citadel by surprise. At Megiddo, or Armageddon, we discern the might of Solomon, the stables where he kept those horses from which he derived such profit, with the holes in the stones, through which the halters of those horses were hitched. Attention is devoted also to caverns and grottoes under Jerusalem which may prove to have been the royal tombs where the kings of Judea, each in his turn, "slept with his fathers."

Even archaeology has to beware of apocrypha. Yet there is one romance, still to be authenticated, which is worth the telling for its own sake. That Solomon married a princess of Egypt is on record. Politically, Moti Maris, as the bride was called, represented a commercial treaty. But in person a susceptible monarch found her to be worthy of a gorgeous palace, all to herself. The story is that Pharaoh wanted to poison Solomon, and, visiting him for this friendly purpose, called on his daughter to offer the fatal cup. Loving too dearly to obey, she dared not disobey, and, as a compromise between duty and affection, she drank the wine and died.

On the rough pavement of Ahab's palace at Samaria we might linger, seeking the shade of Jezebel, that most audacious of all vampires, who, with her husband slain, "painted her face and tired her head," and so taunted King Jehu, the triumphant rival. How she was thrown from her window—this king's daughter in all her glory—and devoured by the dogs of the street, is among the great scenes of all time.

Divided and distraught, the little kingdoms of Judah and Israel, inspired by prophets but too often betrayed by princes, struggled with the great empires, rising and falling around them, to make good the challenge of Abraham. But in the end the chosen people were overwhelmed by conquest and captivity. As pilgrims, they had left the Mesopotamian plain behind them; as prisoners, they returned thither. It seemed as if justice and mercy had been overwhelmed forever by the panoply of pomp and power.

It was Assyria that now dominated the Mesopotamia where Abraham dwelt in Ur of the Chaldees; and at Korsabad, near the Tigris, there has been discovered the vast palace of this pitiless autocracy. It was founded by the fierce conqueror Sargon, who obliterated Samaria and removed by force the first of the Jews to be brought into captivity. The king who completed the palace was that Sennacherib who, in the days of Hezekiah, "came down like a wolf on the fold" against Jerusalem itself, and was met by the king with a calm courage that has been, since his day, among the glories of faith.

It seemed as if pride and power must be omnipotent forever over the free spirit of man. Those huge winged bulls, symbolic of a monarchy that was mainly muscle, that exultation over defeated enemies, that eagerness for the mere rapture of conquest—all this was carved indelibly on corridors of stone. Yet where today is Sargon? Where today is Sennacherib? Strange indeed is the irony that lifts their frieze of solid stone, 100 feet in length, with its record of sanguinary exploits, and, adding the guardian bull that weighs forty tons, transports these trophies to Chicago as the spoils of research.

BEACHES FEED OUR HOME FIRES

THE beaches around New York are seldom entirely deserted, Sundays especially—unless the day is intolerably cold—find a few cars parked along the roadways nearest the sea. Some of the motorists pause only to take a look at the water, shiver and pass on, but many trudge across the sand. They are beachcombers engaged in a popular Winter sport; driftwood collecting has drawn them over the dunes and down near the breakers.

The apartment house dweller who must find fuel for an open fireplace is beset with many problems. Many lumber yards and planing mills have a firewood sideline, from which the buyer may order a quarter of a cord, or a dozen cords, depending on his storage space. But he sometimes finds that the wood which he has bought is only "leavings" which merely sizzle for a bit in the kindling and then "smoke out" the occupants of the room.

In this household everything inflammable goes into the fire. The apartment contributes nothing toward trade with the old paper man. Not even the grocer's cardboard carton comes down the dumbwaiter shaft, and any order arriving in an open box is welcomed with open arms. Even the neighbors may know the dwellers in this apartment as the queer people who tug empty packing boxes up the stairs. At night they glean the gutter for firewood.

The driftwood collector proclaims that he is no mean economizing spirit. He points out that the effort involved makes the driftwood fire in a New York apartment the costliest there is. His urge is esthetic. He wants most of all a crackling blaze, provided by the salt-laden chunks of wood that have sunned on the beach for weeks.

Bending in the face of the wind, the driftwood collector may be spotted on Sundays in Winter moving rapidly over the beach. He stoops often, gathering the stray pieces into a pile. The novice is known by the avidity with which he gathers everything in sight. The experienced weighs each bit mentally before he picks it up. Eyes quicken at the sight of a corner of a massive beam nearly buried in the sand. It is dragged out and a hatchet is produced to cut it up.

Collecting driftwood, veterans say, is like daisy picking. One always spies a bigger prize a little further on, and, no matter how much one has, more is always wanted. In time the pile grows too large for the car, so it is sorted and a huge load taken off. Back at the apartment, the difficulty of disposing of it in the cellar without drawing too much attention presents itself. The job may have to be surreptitiously managed.

The great trouble about driftwood, it is said, is that it makes too good a fire. A carful, representing the investment of an entire Sunday, goes in a few nights. So it soon becomes time for another expedition, and the head of the household wonders why there is no driftwood distributing industry.

THE POTATO'S HISTORY

THE white potato, known as "Irish," is a native of America, like corn and tobacco. The Incas of Peru had it under cultivation for centuries before the Spanish invasion. For 150 years after its discovery by Europeans, only well-to-do people ate potatoes. It was raised in their gardens and the lower classes knew of it by hearsay alone. Commercial production was begun about 1750.

LUDWIG SURVEYS THE SCENE IN PALESTINE

The German Historian Describes the Conflict Of Races and the Tangle of Interests

Below—On the Hills the Shepherds Still Tend Their Flocks: A Night Scene.

By EMIL LUDWIG

JERUSALEM.

NEARLY three years ago Thomas A. Edison asked me about the situation of the Jews in Palestine. I told him what little I knew and alluded to the visible consanguinity of the Jews and the Arabs, who are descended from the same stock. He was silent a moment, then he smiled, pointed to the strawberries that stood before him and said: "Of course they are brothers. So are the roses and the strawberries. But the strawberries have gone into business."

In this striking comparison we have the relationship and the antagonism of the two races; for what is taking place at present in the Holy Land is a conflict between kinsmen. Of what use is it to the Arab to be more handsome, more magnificently built, thin, with fine, aristocratic hands and feet? What good does it do him to be numerically superior or to seek union in a pan-Arabian movement? For he is confronted by one of the cleverest of all races, a race which by virtue of its intelligence and tenacity has maintained itself better than any other during the last 2,000 years. These qualities, it is true, do not make men more handsome, but they make them more successful.

If it was precisely from its dispersion that this race, scattered over the world, derived its power of self-preservation (its eternity, so to speak) a little experiment is now justified—in the most remarkable circumstances—upon a poor strip of land where there is no dispute about priority. For where the cherished holy places of three religions lie in close proximity, nobody is first and it is only he who shows no tolerance toward faiths other than his own who can be said to have forfeited his right to live there.

Here is perhaps the only spot upon the globe where the rule of numbers—either of years or of population—does not apply. It is the international land par excellence. As such it has been characterized for centuries, even when under the Turkish flag, by certain recognized privileges granted to foreign nations; and, finally, a decade ago, it came officially under the protection of the great international organization whose power no armed forces support.

Palestine presents above all a moral problem, and hence it stands under the moral guardianship of the world. Where three religions meet—which embrace a large part of the human race—there is no place for primitive methods of reckoning or for what is still more primitive, force. Having been recognized and guaranteed by fifty-two States when the League of Nations was founded, this basic principle ought never again to be brought into question.

If one examine the problem simply on the basis of figures, one readily finds an apparent solution. Only 17 per cent of the inhabitants are Jews, only 8 per cent Christians; but since all these Christians, excepting about 10,000, are converted Arabs, 80 per cent of the population may be classed, racially, as Arabs. Of the 16,000,000 Jews in the world only 1 per cent live in Palestine. When one observes that only 4 per cent of all the Arabs live there, the reply is made that the 20,000,000 genuine Arabs live in or near compact communities, while 99 per cent of the Jews are dispersed in many lands.

Yet here lies the answer to the riddle. The Jews, alone of all the peoples of the earth, are homeless but have distinguished themselves in all countries as a sort of nomadic race. Though without a centre, without a government and without arms, the power of these 16,000,000 is everywhere perceptible and consequently has engendered jealousy and hatred. They are united by a culture which is closely linked with Christianity and hence is of greater concern to half a billion people than all the treasures of Arabian wisdom. It was precisely for these reasons that, in this time of the new migration of peoples, it was decided to give back to this remarkable race a kind of centre such as it long ago lost. This action acquired a certain historical and symbolical grandeur from the fact that it was the British, those modern Romans, who righted the wrong done by their ancient predecessors and determined to return to the Jews what was taken away from them so many centuries ago.

But the political considerations which led in 1917 to this momentous decision had their moral side also. Why did the British, and later the League of Nations, grant this homeland to the Jews, an unarmed nation, which was divided by the war alignment, if not out of respect for their power, which made itself felt everywhere, both intellectually and financially, after the outbreak of the conflict which they neither caused nor desired? The entente, of course, was obliged to seek allies on both sides and had every reason at the same time to conciliate the Arabs, who as Tukish subjects threatened to become dangerous.

HENCE the declarations and promises whose contradictions, in the exigencies of the moment, might have been considered more readily susceptible of resolution than is the case today. In one of the three promises given to the Arabs between 1916 and 1918 there is an ambiguous reference to a line running west from Damascus which might be interpreted either as giving Palestine to the Arabs or as excluding it from their territory. On the other hand, the Jews received the promise that they would be permitted to settle in Palestine under English protection but without prejudice to the rights of other peoples. When I asked the Mufti (the Mohammedan Cardinal of Jerusalem and the political leader of the Arabs living there) what Lord Balfour could have had in mind in making this double commitment, he replied, after an Oriental pause: "He had England in mind."

If it were the most fruitful section of Arabian territory that was involved, if this were a land really flowing with milk and honey, one could more readily understand the Arabs' resistance. But nothing flows here, not even water. It is a hard, stony country which can be developed only with the greatest effort and skill and the investment of huge sums of capital, and the Arabs for centuries have neglected its development. With money and energy the Jews have accomplished more in a decade than the Turks and Arabs accomplished in all the years of their possession.

To the traveler in Palestine it is not necessary to point out the boundaries which separate the Jewish colonies from those of the Arabs. On the Jewish farms one sees the best Dutch cattle grazing, while big, clean pens are filled with chickens. In an agricultural school in the Emek Valley girls learn to plant and sow and apply fertilizer, studying theoretically in the evening what they have practiced during the day. Vegetables are cultivated everywhere and the grain fields are efficiently plowed with German or American machinery. But a bit further on, in the Arabian districts, you see the fellah following a primitive plow drawn by two buffaloes which turns the soil with a single wooden prong, slowly and laboriously, as in the time of Christ. Along the more fruitful coast the Jews cultivate beautiful orange orchards, as the old Christian colonies did. Sawmills supply the boxes, and the magnificent Jaffa oranges, grape fruit and bananas are grown, picked, packed and shipped after the practical systems of other subtropical lands. At present 2,000,000 boxes to the value of $2,500,000 a year, an amount hitherto unheard of here, are supplied.

Years of study have shown that agriculture of the extensive type could not hold its own here. For if a hectare of land produces 600 kilograms of wheat, that is only one-fourth of the corresponding German production and a still smaller fraction of that in Canada. Hence the colonists are more and more abandoning grain growing and going in for intensive farming with the best methods.

Since such enterprises are not financed or imitated in a turn of the hand, is it not understandable that the Arabs look on angrily at the spectacle of others excelling them upon their soil? The individual, even a whole community, loses all sense of logic when it feels itself outstripped, and even the well-to-do Arabian, who now travels over of aviation. In this country it was Octave Chanute who brought the glider to its greatest efficiency in the years immediately before the Wright brothers made their first flight in a powered plane. Except for Professor Montgomery's experiments in California, interest in gliding died down after 1903, to be revived in Germany after the World War as a consequence of restrictions put upon the manufacture of airplanes by the Treaty of Versailles. From Germany, sport gliding has rapidly spread around the world.

THE GLIDER'S FUTURE

Since sport gliding is not dependent upon any kind of engine power—except in a few isolated instances when the glider is fitted with a small (usually one-cylinder) engine for obtaining altitude—it may be fairly asked, How do gliders fly? The question becomes even more pertinent when it is considered that gliders have been kept up in the air continuously for more than fourteen hours.

GLIDERS are usually launched on the catapult system. Two long rubber ropes are attached to a point on the fuselage and there are four or more men who take each rope and walk to the front, one party to the right and one to the left, roughly at right angles to each other. The glider is kept in position by a trip arrangement or simply by its weight, plus the weight of the pilot, while the ropes are pulled taut. When there is enough tension, the ship is released and the glider is catapulted sharply forward and into the air, when the ropes fall off.

Once in the air the pilot has to manoeuvre his craft in such a way as to take advantage of the rising air currents. This can be done continuously only in hilly country specially selected. The pilot knows beforehand that when the wind strikes a hill there is always a resultant force upward. The take-off is, therefore, from the crest of a hill and immediately after being launched in the air, against the wind, the upward current of air lifts the glider. The pilot then turns, if he has been lifted high enough, and glides in a circle to the starting point and on over the crest of the hill, when the air current again lifts the glider. How long he can continue this process will depend largely on his skill and to a great extent on the velocity and steadiness of the wind.

In long flights the pilot glides from hill to hill and often is able to reach considerable altitudes—and to cover some quite remarkable distances. To do this, however, he will have to know the country like a book, and knowing it means that he can glide to hills that he knows will give him the greatest lift. Since the gliding angle of a glider is very flat, as compared to that of an airplane, he can keep aloft for a longer time at any altitude than can the pilot of a heavy plane. Thus, with a good initial lift, he may guide in a series of straight flights or in a series of circles, or more often a combination of both, passing and repassing over the same hills, each hill supplying enough lift to keep him in flight until he can glide over the next one. This process is continued again and again, and in this way Anton Schultz of Austria is said to have remained continuously aloft for more than fourteen hours.

Gliding is much more difficult than it sounds, and it requires a delicate touch on the controls and considerable ability and good judgment. It is, too, full of thrills, and frequently an ambitious pilot will tingle with excitement as he narrowly misses a landing in an attempt to steer his craft over a hill. Sometimes the margin between sustained flight and an enforced landing are merely the matter of an inch or so. There is always a lot of fun and, if properly controlled, very little danger.

How to DANCE to the new slow music

SLOW-TIME rhythm has completely revolutionized dancing! The ordinary walking step has been replaced by a syncopated double action movement. But this fascinating modern tempo requires finished dancers to interpret it gracefully.

For—very like slow-motion pictures—slow-time rhythms emphasize all one's mistakes while dancing. Slight errors that escaped notice during the mad reign of jazz appear almost unforgivably crude now.

Miss Evelyn Simmonds, a typical member of Arthur Murray's staff of dance experts.

Yet it's so easy to dance to the new slow music with poise and assurance! Arthur Murray's talented young instructors can teach you the smartest of this season's new steps to the slow, subtle tempo now in vogue, in one-fourth the usual time. All instruction private, of course.

You are cordially invited to call this week for a ten minute guest lesson. Corrects your faults and improves your dancing over 50%. No charge! Studio open until 10 P. M.

the hills on excellent motor roads, refuses to recognize that nearly all the money which, by fits and starts, has transformed this country in a decade, has come from Jews who from far overseas look toward this coast and send here a part of their income or their inheritance—for purely moral reasons—because they are actuated by a feeling for an old, long-forgotten homeland which has somewhat suddenly reappeared. Nor does he take cognizance of the eucalyptus forests which have replaced swamps in the struggle against malaria; and when the fellah, his tenant, with the aid of two horses, realizes $150 to the acre, it irritates him to hear that the Jewish farmer gets $600 from the same amount of ground. So he expresses his feelings by denouncing the Jews.

"THE Jews are dispossessing us!" he cries. For years this plaint has echoed in the Arabian press. But the Arabian landlord who long has lived luxuriously in Beirut or Alexandria upon the rents, as Russian princes and counts did in St. Petersburg and Paris, was not only willing but apparently very glad to sell his Palestine land at a high price to the Jew, who was the first buyer to come along in centuries. Moreover, a system of tenancy and sub-tenancy deriving from Turkish times enthralls the poor fellah by means of loans at 30 per cent interest. Such a fellah cannot be said to have been dispossessed by the Jews, but rather by his Arabian lord, whose sale of the land made the former tenant homeless. Why would the landlord thus have deserted his fellow-Arab if it were not that he made a good bargain for himself? But now he suddenly joins forces with the tenant he abandoned and uses him as a pretext and a weapon against the Jews.

In order to avoid litigation, the Jews paid from £30 to £50 in cash to each Arabian tenant farmer who was dispossessed in this way, so that he could rent another piece of ground; for there are thousands of acres in the vicinity which lie fallow, waiting for the farmer, who, it is true, must have patience. Many farmers take advantage of this opportunity, selling half their land to Jews, buying cattle with the proceeds and getting Jewish agriculturists to launch their enterprises for them on modern lines. Near Jaffa I saw small Arabian farms established in this way, and nowhere in Palestine was the rational influence of the Jews more palpable. They made me think of the similar measures taken by Baron von Stein about the year 1810, when the Prussian peasant gained his freedom.

When this is pointed out to the Arab, he replies that it is not such a clever achievement because the Jews lose money, every settler costing them £1,000. But ten of the forty newly established colonies are already self-supporting. Moreover, in the early years of the English colonies each new settler cost the State as much or more than the sum mentioned. This reproach is a good deal like that which a younger and more handsome suitor might hurl at his older and more clever rival: "It isn't fair," he might say. "This man wins the favor of the lady with his fine speaking, his education, his intelligence!"

The mistakes of the Zionists are not to be denied, though they are, perhaps, to be excused. If they have paid too little attention to the Arabs in the last decade, the omission is comprehensible in view of the difficulties they faced in a new country and an unaccustomed climate, and of the fact that nearly all of them had to study their common tongue, Hebrew, and consequently to postpone the learning of Arabic. The second mistake—that of making too much noise—arose from the necessity of awakening through propaganda the interest of the world, without whose contributions they would have failed. Certainly the outrages were connected with their too noisy successes, for it was three days after the Zionists made their compact with the American Jews in Zurich last August that the first disturbances in Jerusalem occurred.

It was likewise a mistake to carry the events at the Wailing Wall from the sphere of religion over into that of nationalism—that is, for the Zionists to take upon themselves a problem which did not directly concern them. For the Zionists as such are not religious, and their movement leads away from Bible and customs rather than toward them. Finally, the term "Jewish state," coined by Herzl when his idealism was in full swing, handicapped the project at the beginning of its realization and it will not thrive in peace until that term disappears.

BUT do not the mistakes of the Arabs weigh more heavily in the balance? Why was it that the world was so aroused when in those August days 130 Jews were slain? Had not thousands been equally innocent victims of Russian pogroms? The special impression made by this latest outrage is the best proof of the Jews' moral right to Palestine. For it was not because a small community, under the protection of the League of Nations, had been set upon that the world was stirred; but rather because this people, having fled from the dangers of persecution and attack, having gone back after a millennial dispersion to the land of its origin and looking forward at last to a tranquil existence, was suddenly assailed and butchered even here on this poor stretch of land where it had sought peace.

I visited the political leader of the Arabs, the Mufti, in his dark, solemn-looking high-towered medieval palace above the Omar Mosque, after passing through streets so narrow that only a skilled chauffeur could make his way. Upon entering, I thought I was face to face with three Jews, so close the resemblance often is between the Jews and the Arabs. But the three men before me were the Mufti himself, a young man of the blond, sensuous type, wearing a short, reddish beard, reserved and reflective; next to him a prepossessing patriarch with a white beard and an aristocratic nose, who reminded me of the old man of the ghetto whom Rembrandt once etched; and, in a corner, an Arab of the swarthy type. All were enveloped in long, black robes, and only by the turban were they distinguishable from Jewish scribes.

For two hours I sought in vain to obtain from the Mufti an unequivocal explanation of the recent violence. "We received three promises from the English," he said, "but the strongest proof of our right is that we are here.

"We have nothing against the Jews. We want to be their friends. We have no desire to drive them away, and we are willing to give guarantees to permit further Jewish immigration to a certain extent. What we need is a Parliament in which we have the majority."

WHEN I conveyed this reasonable, sounding observation to the other parties, I was told that the report which the investigating committee would make must be awaited.

This committee, meeting with pleasing unceremoniousness in a small, dark room, exhibited a racial composite suggestive of those conjured up by accounts of the time of the Crusades, although no colorful costumes were to be seen and the British chairman, a judge, did not even wear his wig, which would have impressed the Orientals particularly. Since he would not sit in the middle, the committee being composed of four men, the chairman had upon his right the "government"—that is, the Labor representative—and on his left the combined opposition. As is usually the case, the Labor leader looked very conservative, and the most active of the four was the Liberal, who is a Welshman. Between the Arabs, and in striking contrast to them, sat their two English attorneys, who reminded one of typical English clergymen. One looked a bit like Hoover, the other rather like Wilson. All four lawyers seemed driven to despair by the passive resistance manifested by the Arabs under cross-examination.

Following the committee's report, the two parties will be brought together round a table. The outrages have at least brought about the present review of the whole problem, which may contribute to its solution. In any case the attitude of the English will be clarified. What is their attitude today?

As I went through Nazareth one morning, at a turning of the road I suddenly came upon a troop of sy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" (1902). Eight operas in the fifteen years between 1890 and 1905, as against two in the like period between 1905 and 1920, or against a solitary one opera, if "L'Amore dei Tre Re" be excluded!

TWILIGHT OF THE GODS OF GRAND OPERA

So it is, indeed, a sorry pass to which grand opera has come, as a result of the failure of present-day composers to add operas to the regular repertory. The situation as regards singers is hardly less promising. Whereas, up to a few years ago, quite a large number of world-renowned tenors and sopranos, baritones, contraltos and basses, flitted back and forth across the ocean to fill lucrative engagements in the opera houses of America and Europe, today there are only a very few who can lay claim to anything like the prestige of their predecessors.

Turn back twenty or twenty-five years and one can name, at random, Caruso, Melba, Nordica, Eames, Calvé, the two de Reszkes, Chaliapine, Plançon, Scotti, Tetrazzini, Geraldine Farrar, Mary Garden—still the list is far from complete. What of today? A few of the stars of those days are still headliners, notably Mary Garden and Chaliapine, but who, within the last few years, has risen to the topmost rank in opera and won a prestige comparable with that enjoyed by the great singers of yesterday? Maria Jeritza, perhaps. But who besides her?

This, then, is the sad situation in a form of theatrical entertainment which, up to now, has progressed steadily alike in technical development and popular favor. Since the "invention" of grand opera by Monteverdi back in the early seventeenth century it has strode forward, surviving every change of taste in the world's audiences, only to run into the stagnation which at the present time seems to be threatening its very existence.

MONTEVERDI and his contemporaries handed the development of the new form of musical drama over to more lyrical composers. They, having further improved it, bequeathed it to Glück, who developed it so successfully that, to this very day, operas by him, composed back in the eighteenth century, are still given in European and American opera houses.

From Glück it passed to composers whose names have figured ever since in the operatic repertory—Beethoven, who gave it "Fidelio"; Rossini, whose "Barber of Seville" is more than 100 years old; and that later galaxy of musical celebrities—Donizetti, Bellini, Ponchielli, Verdi—in the singing of whose works the exponents, male and female, of "bel canto" found their finest opportunities. In this stage of its development the orchestral side of grand opera—esteemed most important by earlier composers like Claudio Monteverdi and Glück—was sacrificed to provide brilliant opportunities for singers; hence the vogue of "coloratura," of arias with flowery variations, enabling the golden-throated stars of the opera to display to perfection their vocal abilities.

Side by side, however, with this glorification of the voice, that master of orchestration, Richard Wagner, was hard at work—in the shadow at first, but later, by virtue of the irresistible force and merit of his works, as the dominating genius of the operatic stage. In Wagner's hands the voice was relegated to a subordinate rôle; the orchestra became the supreme "star" of the opera. Yet, paradoxical as it may seem, the advent of Wagner served to give impetus to the song birds of the stage, instead of bringing them to their twilight.

After the German's triumph, no operatic composer dared write music for the stage with the disregard for the orchestra that was characteristic of Verdi (in his earlier works), Rossini, Donizetti and the rest of them. The Wagner imprint was unmistakable in almost every work of importance produced in the 1880s and afterward, nowhere more markedly than in the works composed by Strauss during his earlier period. Yet the old "bel canto" operas continued to flourish side by side with those composed by Wagner himself and those of the composers influenced by him; diva after diva won her way to a niche beside Jenny Lind and Patti by singing "Una voce poco fa" in the "Barber," or "Caro nome" in "Rigoletto," just as their predecessors had sung them—despite the fact that "Die Walküre" and "Tristan" and "Meistersinger" had forced the singers seeking fame by the Wagnerian route to adopt a method diametrically opposed to everything taught by the great professors of "bel canto."

But can singers go on forever singing the same old songs? Can grand opera remain static much longer? Will not the disfavor into which it is beginning to fall with audiences grow until the present-day crisis becomes even worse?

Such questions are being answered by pessimists in the affirmative; look as they may, they see no silver lining on the operatic clouds. And they keep reverting to what they consider the basic trouble: the dearth of operatic composers capable of composing works of sufficient vitality to remain in the repertory. At the conclusion of his recent remarks on the operatic crisis, Signor Gatti-Casazza was asked:

"If another Giuseppe Verdi or Richard Wagner should appear and start composing operas, would the operatic crisis come to an end?"

"Certainly," the director of the Metropolitan Opera House replied, without a moment's hesitation.

CONTRASTS THAT MAKE BOSTON

by John M. Casey's watchful eyes and attentive ears. Thus hundreds of Bostonians were compelled to go to Quincy in order to attend a performance of "Strange Interlude."

Though Boston has been made extremely sensitive by outside criticism of its peculiar institution its citizens are not in the least likely to dispense with it. An effort is being made this year to bring the State censorship law into line with those of other States. It probably will not succeed. The army that is fighting to keep the serpent out of the Bay State Eden has suffered from dissensions in its own ranks but it stands firm against the common enemy.

But the forces which present such a united front against suspected immorality in print or on the stage fall into bitter internecine warfare when the other great moral question of the day is under discussion. Boston is not united in its attitude toward intoxicating beverages. It is probable that the Brahmins drink, in their genteel way, but they are apt to frown on open dalliance with bootleggers. Some of them, it is said, still draw prudently and on stated occasions on the perfectly legal contents of prewar cellars. The fundamentalists are, as a rule, as fundamental about liquor as about evolution. They regard it as a traffic of the devil and would do away with it if they could. But they have not crusaded against it very strenuously or very successfully, for the reason that the dominating sentiment which supports them in matters of sexual morals does not support them in suppressing liquor.

The Faneuil Hall meeting which resulted in the overturning of several recruiting stands of the Coast Guard was given more space in out-of-town newspapers than in the Boston publications. It was not in itself important. Nevertheless, it had significance. It not only expressed an attitude toward prohibition, but it gave vent, also, to an ancient New England sentiment against the interference of the central government with what are deemed local interests.

The killing of three rum-runners by Coast Guardsmen off Newport stirred as hot resentment in some breasts as did the Boston Massacre of a century and a half ago. It probably strengthened the movement which has been on foot this year to repeal the Massachusetts "baby Volstead act." But though Boston is overwhelmingly wet, it is more or less under the thumb of an up-State legislative majority who think that hard cider is good enough for anybody. The legislative majority is aided in its efforts to keep Boston pure and honest by the fact that the State controls the municipal police and supervises the municipal finances.

But the moving finger continues to write. Sons of the elder families marry daughters of more recent arrivals. The new immigration—by which is meant almost anybody and everybody who has settled in Boston within the past hundred years—is beginning to make itself felt financially as well as politically and to sit on boards of directors as well as in caucus meetings.

CHANGE is on the wing. Old traditions are giving place to new. Yet if one forgets the traditions and the principles over which radicals and reactionaries wrangle, the city has an outward personality that is pungent of the salty past. It cannot fail to strike a visiting New Yorker, no matter how often he goes there, as a happier city than his own, though certainly not so gay a one. The Common is an integral part of it, which one uses in going from one business street to another. The buildings that rim the Common are still relatively low. The old winding streets have a charm that can be found on Manhattan only rarely. Beacon Hill retains many of its old houses, with their air of ineffable leisure and security. No walk in an American city, except perhaps Riverside Park in New York and the Marina in San Francisco, surpasses the esplanade along the River Charles.

There is no question, either, that the inhabitants are calmer and more polite than those in most cities north of the Mason and Dixon line. This may be due to topography, street plan, racial composition or any of the several or a dozen different factors. It is not, however, due to the climate, which is often regrettable. But it makes even a stranger understand that a sensible Bostonian may be willing to put up with a good deal of nonsense from his narrower-minded fellow-citizens rather than take steps to make his city too different from what it is.

THINGS THAT MAKE BOSTON WHAT SHE IS

Censorship, Prohibition, Brahmins, and a New Political Order Afford Strange Contrasts

The Old and New Boston.

By R. L. DUFFUS

IN her time Boston has been known as The Hub of the Universe and as the Athens of America. She has been famous for her tea party, her Common, her baked beans, her codfish, her trade with the Orient, her Back Bay section, her literary men and her philosophers. Somehow these things have made a picture which hangs together. But the news of recent months has made the city harder to classify. She has become a patchwork of incongruities: on the one hand the little group of Puritans and descendants of Puritans who so long dominated her affairs, on the other Mayor James Michael Curley, who took office for his third nonconsecutive term at the beginning of the year; on the one hand the Watch and Ward Society and the book and play censorship, on the other a recent mass meeting in Faneuil Hall, which ended in the tearing down of Coast Guard recruiting posters; on the one hand the influence of near-by Harvard College, on the other the accepted fact that musical comedies do well in Boston and serious plays do not.

This sort of antithesis could be kept up indefinitely. Boston in 1930 is a city of contrasts and of conflicts. She is not so much one city as many cities. The police strike which started Calvin Coolidge on his way to the Presidency; the Sacco-Vanzetti case, whose bitterness is not yet forgotten; "the Boston Massacre of 1927," when sixty-eight books fell under the ban of the censor; the refusal to license "Strange Interlude" and the proceedings against Dreiser's "An American Tragedy"; the extreme severity with which offenses against morality are punished in the courts and the extreme tolerance with which offenses against the prohibition enactments are regarded—all these are high lights in a portrait which resembles the scrambled features of the work of some modernistic painter. Something similar might be said of other cities. But the truth is the more striking in the case of Boston because this city, more than most, once had a sedate and conscious uniformity. In those days it might have sat to Copley or Stuart for its portrait. But now Boston's uniformity is as out of date as powdered wigs and snuffboxes.

That is to say, it is out of date if Boston is considered to be the sum total of its inhabitants. But it is impossible to understand much of what goes on in the metropolis on the Charles unless one realizes that there still exists a very important minority in whom the old traditions are very much alive. The little old Boston which achieved so much and made its name so widely known survives as a kind of enclave within the—relatively—tumultuous new Boston. The Brahmin class have not died. Neither have they resigned. An interpretation of Boston must still begin with them, though it may have to end with Mayor Curley or with John M. Casey, who sits in the Mayor's office under Democratic and Republican administrations alike and passes upon the virtues and vices of plays for which licenses are requested.

In actual numbers the Brahmins, descendants of the God-fearing farmers, clergymen and merchants who founded the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, are probably not numerous. There may be 500 or even 1,000, counting all the aunts and cousins, who can be considered as belonging to the untitled aristocracy of the city and its suburbs. They are influential because they still hold the main citadels of capital, because they still seem to possess a considerable degree of administrative ability and because they are woven into almost all the charitable enterprises of the Commonwealth. A friendly critic says of them that though they no longer give off new ideas they are none the less excellent executives. President Lowell of Harvard stands out among them as a leader who can manage a great university and also keep well abreast of educational thought.

The Brahmins of Boston and Cambridge may be seen at the symphony concerts, taking the joys of music somewhat soberly but conscientiously. They belong to the Atheneum, part library, part exclusive club. If they wish to bestow the accolade upon a newcomer they extend to him the privileges of this admirable institution for a stated season. Their men folks are members of the Somerset Club, most of whose ancestors came over in the Mayflower. Their women folks keep up what are called sewing circles, though little sewing is done at the meetings, and the sewing circles make up the membership of the exclusive Vincent Club.

THEY have a consciousness of relationships and an addiction to funerals which would delight the heart of the traditional English novelist. If one of their tribe makes a poor marriage or in some way wanders outside the ancestral fold they refer to him or her deprecatingly as "Poor, dear Richard," or "Poor, dear Sallie." Their social life is unspeakably respectable. Outsiders say that it is also unspeakably dull. Its defects, as nearly as unbiased judgment can present them, are a certain reticence and coldness, a passion for conformity and a profound distrust of enthusiasm. "Nowhere in the United States," said one observer who knew them well and loved some of them, "is there a severer penalty for being different." They retain, nevertheless, an Old-World culture and charm. They are well educated in the polite branches of learning, they do not like to hurt people's feelings, and, men and women alike, they love their gardens and will talk endlessly of bulbs. They are so confidently aristocratic that they often seem perfectly democratic.

have huge flapping wings, some serpents for legs. One has the head and upper body of a lion, another the horns of a bull. Others are represented in human form—like most of the gods.

The gods are victorious. Some of them are represented as in terrible straits. The battle was so fierce that the gods could not win without the help of Heracles. And even the eagle of Zeus, the hunting dog of Artemis, and other beasts took part in the fight.

Many different sculptors must have been employed in a work of such vast size and so complicated. It is probable that they received only general directions and were left to arrange details according to their abilities. Inequalities of design and execution may be found. But, taken as a dynamic whole, the design is magnificent and the execution unsurpassed in its virtuosity even in the Hellenistic period, when nothing was too difficult for a Greek sculptor, no emotion impossible to portray.

In spite of the bold dramatic exaggeration and many unusual features of the frieze, in its composition it followed on the lines of the frieze of the Parthenon. Before the frieze was placed in its proper setting in Germany it was looked upon as theatrical and baroque. Now its dramatic grandeur becomes evident. The faces of the defeated giants are more than tragic masks. In this great work, as in one of the metopes of the Parthenon, the conquered foe is treated generously and with understanding. Most of the gods are presented with mild and conventional features. This is in accordance with the convention that a god or a Greek must not be shown suffering or excited—a convention that Hellenistic artists often disregarded.

There is another frieze, smaller, on the wall surrounding the inner court. Time has battered this more devastatingly than the great frieze. Less than half of it survives. This is called the Telephos frieze. And its inspiration is an ageless commentary on unchanging human nature.

Having risen to greatness in a very few years, Pergamon had no past. And consequently no connection with myths or mythological personages. When the little rock fortress had become a mighty capital, the poets and antiquarians decided to create a tradition. So the old story of Telephos, son of Heracles and the Arcadian Princess Auge, was brought into connection with Pergamon. And Telephos became the founder of the city in that new chapter of mythology.

The Telephos frieze is a departure in Greek art. It is more pictorial than sculptural. The influence of painting on sculpture was probably very great. But as all the works of the great painters are lost we cannot be sure how they treated their subjects. Here, for the first time in Greek sculpture, we have a series of scenes divided from each other only by a pillar, a tree or even the mere fact that figures in one scene turn their backs on those in the next.

The meaning of each figure cannot be determined, unfortunately, because the frieze is too fragmentary. But in the illustration we probably have the arrival of Heracles. Then he is brought to a sudden standstill by the sight of Auge among the trees. The delicate workmanship and idyllic quiet of the Telephos frieze have been compared to the pastoral poems of Theocritus in their aloofness from the blasé world that surrounded them.

That the modern world will have these superb sculptures of antiquity is due to the interest that the Hohenzollerns took in excavations on historic sites at a time when other nations were more or less apathetic. The discovery of the remains of the great altar began in 1869, when Carl Humann, who had been sent to construct a road at Pergamon, noticed that one of his workmen had dug up a slab of marble on which the figure of a god was carved in high relief.

Humann saw the dramatic significance of the discovery. He went the next day to have the sculpture put in a safe place. Upon looking for it he was staggered to find that the slab had been cut up and used to make a step. Further examination showed that several carved slabs had been built into a Byzantine wall. But in 1878 the German Government became actively interested. Systematic excavations were started under Humann and Conze.

The sculptures were so badly broken that at first there seemed to be only a possibility of reconstructing a few isolated scenes. But they kept on. By extraordinary perseverance and patience nearly five-sixths of the whole have been pieced together today. There always must be irrevocable gaps. For some years ago the excavators came upon some ancient lime kilns and knew that further search for the parts that had gone to that anonymous grave would be useless. Those parts were gone forever.

Attalos III, the fifth and last King of Pergamon, bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people. Rome had been a friend and an ally. Under the rule of Rome the grandeur of Pergamon continued for a time, but in the reign of Constantine, Ephesos became the metropolis of Asia Minor, and the power of Pergamon waned as swiftly as it had risen. The destroyers could not be kept at bay forever. Not the Gauls but the Seleucid Turks finally captured the arrogant city on the hill. That was in 133 A. D. Three centuries later there were only heaps of débris on the Acropolis. Pergamon had gone the way of all antiquity. But in the magnificent halls on an island in Berlin it will this year have its renascence.

SOME VARIATIONS OF RUM IN COLONIAL DAYS

TODAY'S word "rum," used in a broad sense to designate all kinds of forbidden liquors, may refer to the "corn" of the South, Bacardi from Cuba, apple-jack or "Jersey lightning," or the "red ink" of Greenwich Village. In Colonial days, however, rum was rum, no more and no less, but some of its near relatives were powerful concoctions and bore some peculiar names.

The word rum is believed to have been derived from a West Indian word "rumbullion" with a pleasant, alliterative sound. The article itself was sometimes described as "kill-divil, a hot, hellish and terrible liquor."

Then there was "coow woow," described by an English clergyman as made of "molasses, water and some ginger worked up together." Blackstrap, made of rum and molasses, was sold in every country store and tavern. Grog, a mixture of rum and water, was so named after the coat of grogram (a material made of silk and mohair), worn by the English Admiral who diluted the "straight" drink ordinarily meted out to British sailors.

Toddy, a favorite drink in early days, consisted of rum, hot water and sugar, somewhat similar to the drink sometimes advised today as a cure for colds and other things. "Flip" was one of the common drinks, made of strong beer sweetened with sugar, molasses or dried pumpkin, and rum, into which mixture was thrust a red-hot loggerhead, or bar of iron. The hot iron caused the mixture to foam and bubble, and gave it a burnt, bitter taste. Switchel, composed of rum, water, molasses and vinegar, was a sailor's drink. Perhaps the most unusual drink was one made of sour beer, cooked, sweetened with molasses, filled with crumbs of brown bread and drunk while hot.

Quit Work at 55

THIS page is addressed to men who want to retire on an income.

It tells how you can provide a life of leisure for yourself by following a simple financial program called the Retirement Income Plan.

You don't have to be wealthy to follow this plan. Any man of moderate means can follow it. All you have to do is to make a deposit of a few dollars a month—the exact amount depending on your age.

Your retirement income begins at any age you say—55, 60, or 65. It can be any amount you wish—$100 a month, $200, $300, or more. The money is paid to you by check. The checks are sent to you by mail—monthly or quarterly, or at whatever intervals you wish.

This life income is as sure and as safe as a government pension. It is unconditionally guaranteed to you by the Phoenix Mutual Company, a 79-year-old company with assets of over 135 million dollars.

This company is recognized as one of the safest and most conservative in this country. It has been in existence for more than three quarters of a century. The financial policies of the company are approved by the governments of the 35 states of the United States in which the company is represented.

Once you have provided an income for yourself under the Phoenix Mutual Retirement Income Plan, you may rely on that income completely and implicitly. Nothing can stop it. Nothing can delay it. Nothing can take that income from you.

Other Benefits

There are other benefits which may be included in this plan. A guaranteed income for your wife, in case anything happens to you. Money to send your children to college. Money for emergencies. Money to leave your home free of debt. Money for other needs.

Perhaps the greatest advantage of the plan is this: The minute you pay your first deposit, your biggest money worries begin to disappear. Even if you were totally and permanently disabled the next day, you would not need to worry about finances. Your deposits would be paid by us out of a special reserve fund provided for that purpose.

In addition, you would be paid a regular monthly income to live on. This income would continue as long as your disability lasted, even if it lasted the rest of your life. Furthermore, as they fall due, you would be entitled to receive all the other benefits you had planned to receive, just as if you were paying the deposits yourself.

For completeness, for safety, for absolute freedom from money worries, there is nothing that can equal the Phoenix Mutual Retirement Income Plan.

Think of it! The thrill of it! The rockbound security of it! A guaranteed income you cannot outlive. What a load off your mind. What a weight off your shoulders. The sudden lifting of your biggest financial worries gives you a new lease on life—a new outlook—a new freedom you never experienced before.

Retirement Income Plan

Here is what a $200 a month Retirement Income Plan will do for you:

It guarantees when you are 55
A Monthly Income for life of $200, which assures a return of $20,000 and perhaps more, depending on how long you live. Or if you prefer, a Cash Settlement of $30,200.

It guarantees upon death from any cause before age 55
A Cash Payment to your beneficiary of $20,000. Or a Monthly Income for life.

It guarantees upon death resulting from accident before age 55
A Cash Payment to your beneficiary of $40,000. Or a Monthly Income for life.

It guarantees during permanent total disability beginning before age 55
A Monthly Income of $200. Plans for women or for retirement at ages 60 and 65 are also available.

shrewd and dispassionate outside observers—they are haunted by a growing apprehension. They have long been outnumbered by a different race with a different temperament and a different religion. Now they begin to fear that before many years their carefully guarded power, and with it their cherished culture and traditions, will disappear. Therefore they tend to be completely conservative, resisting any deep change in their own lives or in that of their community. They offer the most inhospitable soil conceivable for the planting of new economic, social or moral ideas. The Sacco-Vanzetti case still lingers in their minds, though it may not be present in their conversations. They saw in it not only a question of two men's guilt but a challenge to their whole system of law and order. But they also seem to see this challenge in such very different phenomena as the new movements in the arts and the younger generation's ideas about family life.

BUT the Brahmins are not crusaders—they are far too dignified for it. They are fundamentalists in manners rather than in morals or religion, and they do not attempt to convert their 800,000 fellow-citizens to their own notions of perfect behavior. Indeed, they seem slightly oblivious to the masses of their fellow-citizens, except as objects of worthy charity. They are public-spirited. They are gracious. But they are undeniably aloof. None the less, though they do not crusade, Boston's crusading does get done.

The Brahmins are, in short, a kind of back drop against which there goes on a very lively drama. It is impossible to discuss the actors in this drama without using religious terminology. In times past Boston was a Protestant city, with a predominant English infusion. In fact, it was more like a bit of transplanted England than anything this side of the Scilly Islands. But the majority of the city's residents and voters are now Catholics of Irish descent. Naturally there are differences of opinion between the Irish and English stocks in other matters than religion. There are temperamental differences, too. But in respect to their opinions about domestic morals the two stocks and the two religions are not far apart.

Fundamentalism in Boston strikes deep and wide. Cardinal O'Connell, one of the ablest and most vigorous servants of his church in America, and such Protestant clergymen as the Rev. A. Z. Conrad, pastor of the famous old Park Street Congregational Church, differ in their theology but not in their attitude toward questionable books and plays. Whether one is a Catholic, a Methodist, a Baptist, or a Congregationalist in Boston, one is held to pretty exacting standards. The tradition of Puritanism, if not its blood, runs everywhere.

This fact does much to explain the local censorship of books and plays. The censorship is very much on Boston's mind—perhaps because it has exposed the community to so much derision, perhaps because it makes the more enlightened members of the community feel a little silly. Everywhere one goes the talk sooner or later turns to this subject. Whether an individual citizen is in favor of censorship or against censorship or sitting on the fence, he feels it necessary, like the Ancient Mariner, to stop an occasional passer-by with his long beard and glittering eye and explain himself. Boston may not yet be book-conscious, but it certainly is censorship-conscious.

THE famous Watch and Ward Society, of which the late Rev. Frank Chase was long the main prop and stay, is a perfect example of the catholicity—with a small "c"—of Boston's Puritanism. Though its original impetus and present driving force may be described as fundamental Protestant, it has always included representatives of all the important sects. Catholic and Protestant joined hands when an attempt was made to circulate in Boston books which threatened what both regarded as the ideals of family life. The outsider will never understand Boston's censorship until this point is clear. The leaders in the crusade are not interested in literature. They are resisting in every way they can every modern influence which, as they see it, threatens to break up the traditional family group. They are just as definite in their ideas as Bertrand Russell and Ben Lindsey are in theirs. Censorship is a means, not an end.

For some years under the reign of the Rev. Mr. Chase censorship was not an issue because no one but the booksellers and the members of the Watch and Ward Society ever heard anything about it. A committee from the society sat with a committee of the booksellers. If a majority of the joint committee thought a book bad it was withdrawn from sale, no advertisements of it were published and no newspaper reviewed it. If a majority thought it safe reading nothing was done. The booksellers liked this plan better than being arrested, haled to court and perhaps tried before a jury which had never so much as read a book. Mr. Chase's death ended the era of good feeling, and in 1927 some sixty-eight books were suppressed by the police, denounced by the Watch and Ward or withdrawn voluntarily by frightened booksellers. Sherwood Anderson, St. John Ervine, Olive Schreiner, Count Keyserling, H. G. Wells, Eden Phillpotts, Sinclair Lewis and May Sinclair were among the authors whose books felt the axe.

SINCE 1927 there has been a feeling in some quite respectable and decorous quarters that censorship, though necessary, had been crude in its methods. This feeling was strengthened when agents of the Watch and Ward Society used the tactics of the agent provocateur to entrap a Cambridge bookseller who had been vending D. H. Lawrence's latest volume. Even the judge who had to sentence the guilty merchant was moved to denounce the manner in which the evidence against him was obtained.

However, it is not certain that Boston in the mass takes the book censorship very seriously. Like most American cities it fails to take books very seriously. A single Boston bookstore does 1 per cent of the general retail book trade of America and the local book-buying public spends about $1 per capita of the population annually on books. But this figure, though above the national average, is not dazzling. Most of Boston, like most of New York, sticks to the newspapers and magazines. It could go on enjoying life even though all modern books were suppressed.

The play censorship is on a different footing. No play can be presented without a license, which the Mayor may give or refuse, and no play can continue if a commission consisting of the Mayor, the Police Commissioner and the Chief Justice of the Municipal Court decide that it ought not to. Few plays with naughty words or suggestive situations in them ever get tried to protect the honor of the goal posts.

HUNTING THE SOUVENIR

Later in life the fruits of hunting cease to be spectacular and become more varied. There are sections of masonry from Europe, and the bark of redwood trees from the West. Pieces or paddle-wheels are side by side with empty cartridge shells in the first right-hand drawer of the library desk. Tucked in the back are autographed programs of banquets and public affairs in general.

THE scroll of souvenir-hunting bears several great records. First of all is the field gun that was taken, camouflage and all, from the public green of a small town in Connecticut. This was done in the dark of night, a fact that detracts just a little from the glory of the achievement; but it was done so thoroughly that mystery still surrounds the event. In the same town, a year before, souvenir-hunters took some two dozen Revolutionary War cannon balls.

And then there are the nature-lovers who seek their souvenirs at the Bronx Zoo. Only a few weeks ago the authorities were faced with the disappearance of a three-foot crane. Two days after the bird was taken there came a telegram reading that it was "borrowed by a lover of birds"—presumably as the tangible recollection of a visit. It was later returned.

Three or four years ago there was another startling event at the Zoo. Some one, in the dead of night, bored a hole into the back of the cobras' den and tried to get a cobra. He failed, but not through lack of careful preparation. The Zoo authorities and the police up there are still wondering what any one would do with such a dangerous pet. No one could explain it.

In Cambridge, Mass., some two and a half years ago, three young men saw an armored car standing empty in front of a bank. That seemed a fitting souvenir of something—although just what is not clear—so they got in and drove off. The armored car was never recovered.

Having been face to face with the souvenir urge for so long, those in authority at banquets, in hotels and in buildings are now developing methods of crime prevention. Gideon Bibles are oftentimes chained to their tables, and caterers make sure that a fitting memento is given to each guest. Whereas in the old days the departing diner took a spoon, now he takes a neatly engraved program or a cigarette box. Or, perhaps, a bit of shrubbery.

It has been found, also, that the roving population of the country can be persuaded to buy souvenirs. A visitor to the top of the Woolworth Building no longer wonders how he can knock off one of the gilded icicles; he merely buys a replica of the entire building. Instead of stealing a stalactite he acquires a piece of stone labeled "Stalactite From Giftie Shoppe."

And there are some hotels, and some institutions, that grimly print upon their various properties: "This Article Is Stolen."

HOW THE SIRLOIN GOT ITS NAME

THE sirloin of beef, according to an old story, owes its name to King Charles II of England, who, dining upon a loin of beef and being particularly pleased with it, asked the name of the joint. On being told he said, "For its merit then, I will knight it, and henceforth it shall be called Sir-Loin."

In a ballad of the New Sir John Barleycorn, this circumstance is thus mentioned:

Our second Charles, of fame facete,
On loin of beef did dine;
He held his sword, pleased, o'er the meat—
"Arise, thou famed Sir-Loin."

The Seat nobody would sit in

ACTUALLY, his case was so bad that even when the car was crowded, the seat beside his was vacant. People simply wouldn't sit next to him. And he wondered why he didn't get anywhere, socially or in business.

Do you Offend? Probably

The only one who doesn't realize that he or she has halitosis (unpleasant breath) is the victim. Social ostracism follows. Don't fool yourself that you are always free of halitosis. That is folly. Surveys show 1 person out of 3 is a victim—due to the fact that the mouth is the constant scene of germ activities, some of which result in bad breath.

Don't take a chance

Keep yourself ever free of halitosis by the systematic and frequent use of full strength Listerine as a mouth wash.

Though safe and pleasant, full strength Listerine is an active germicide* which immediately attacks the cause of odors, and then, being a powerful deodorant, destroys the odors themselves.

Keep Listerine handy and use it before any engagement, that you may appear at your best. Our free Book of Etiquette may interest you. Address Dept. H-9, Lambert Pharmacal Co., St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.

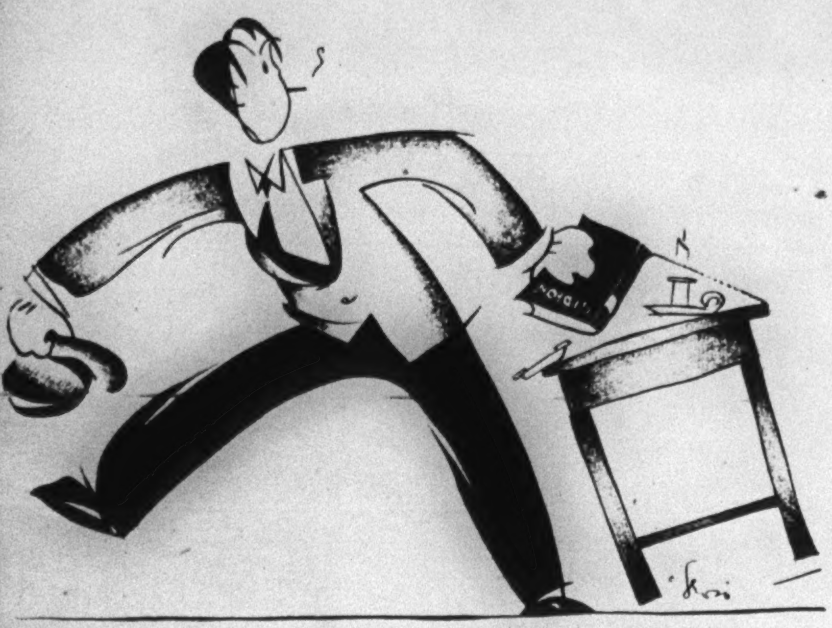
THE SOUVENIR HUNTER SEEKS NEW FIELDS

His Art Is Universal, but at the Moment Many of His Treasures Are Found in the Hotels



"Hotels Are Now Developing Methods of Crime Prevention."

By LEWIS NICHOLS

THREE centuries ago the local Indians stole scalps as souvenirs of happy moments spent among the local settlers. A century later the more enterprising of the local settlers were seizing ships. By some they were called pirates, by others patriots. A hundred years ago there was a great ado about Congress, and no museum was complete without at least one Senator in effigy. Finally, in the year 1927, the descendants of the early settlers were taking long hairs from the tail of Pahwah, the white elephant.

The above history of souvenir hunting in and about New York does not show decadence. It shows, in the first instance, that there are merely no more Indians. The early settlers were better hunters than they. But just as three centuries ago no well-kept tepee was complete without at least one Nordic scalp, no modern museum is complete without a hatchet and six arrowheads.

In the second place, the seizure of ships has only passed out of private enterprise. There are laws that prevent a respectable mid-Western church warden from walking off with the Bremen—even though he can slip some of the Bremen's silverware into his pocket. But from reports regarding one thing and another the seizure of ships still goes on. There is now, indeed, a conference about ships which may end by making souvenir hunting even harder than it was.

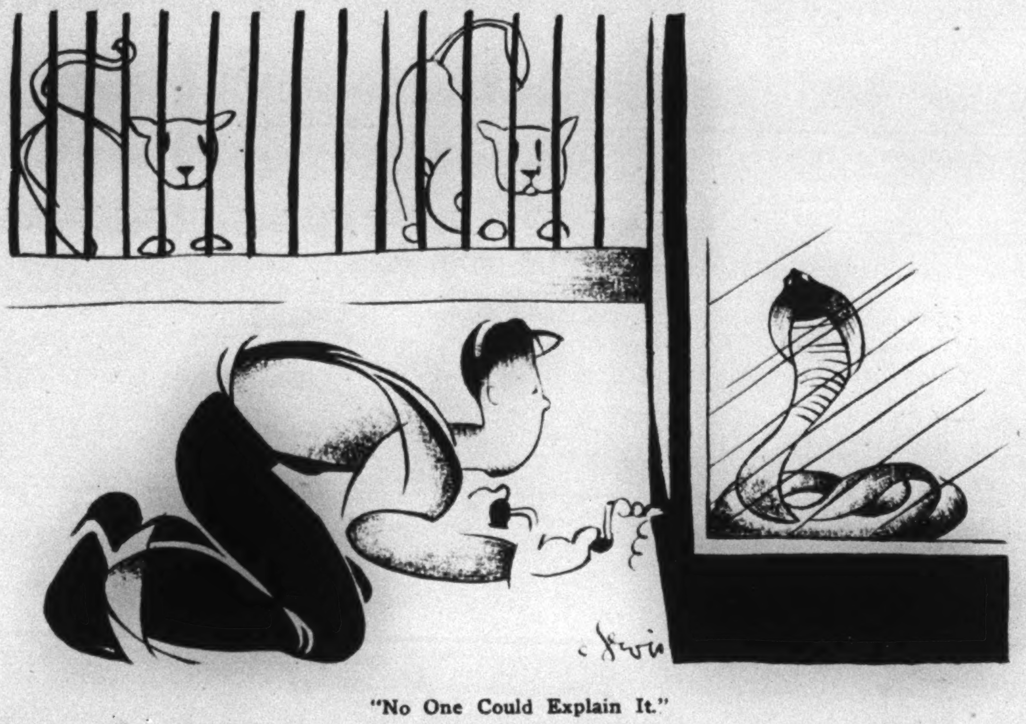
Thirdly, the problem of Senators is not new. There have always been Senators, just as there have always been heretics who wanted to take them to museums. Some of the heretics have been more active than the others; they have stuffed their representatives, burned them and then kept the charred remnants. That was fair enough—a souvenir and a museum piece of note. But no one does it much any more. Perhaps, as it has been said, they know about Senators now.

To fix definitely the time of the final phase of New York hunting it was early in 1927 that Pahwah came to this country. It is not every country that can boast as visitor a white elephant. Both Pahwah and Dexter Fellowes were duly impressed. But then the public began to hear about it and long pilgrimages were taken to the basement of the Garden. Pahwah's fine tail disappeared almost over night, because a hair from the tail of a white elephant is an exceptional prize.

Of course, souvenir-hunting is not limited to the metropolitan area alone. Napoleon grandly seized the four bronze horses that pranced majestically before the façade of St. Mark's in Venice. Earlier in life these same horses had been pilfered by the Venetians from unhappy Constantinople. Another horse, a gift souvenir from the Greeks, is likewise well known.

Captain Kidd and Ali Baba and his forty thieves were in the upper brace of hunters. They made some errors in judgment, however. So did the man who wanted souvenirs so badly that he took Detective Johnson's pistol at the Vitale dinner.

Natural caves are the happy hunting ground for private museum collectors. It is fair to suppose that scarcely a hunter exists who has not carefully garnered a stalactite, or a stalagmite. They linger under glass in homes throughout the world; they are occasionally used for paper weights on the desks of the mighty. On them are legends—"Penn's Cave, July 16, 1923."



"No One Could Explain It."

Pieces of the Robert E. Lee and the Natchez, which raced up the Mississippi in the 1870s, are still the objects of collectors. Rails split by Lincoln are at a high premium. Chunks of Yale goal posts hang happily from a thousand Harvard rooms. During the Hall-Mills murder investigation and the subsequent trial, groups of small boys toured New Jersey selling pieces of wood. This was despite the fact that the famous crabapple tree had gone. Plymouth Rock has been chipped and torn until it was necessary to put up a fence and guards. Flags have been cut and wooden objects have been whittled and carved. Large chunks of stone have been carted away from aged Italian masonry and small golden coins from the tombs of the Egyptians.

LESS than a minute after Lindbergh landed in Paris people were busily cutting pieces from the fabric of the Spirit of St. Louis. A year later Lindbergh revealed why he had to buy so many shirts. The laundries insisted on keeping them as souvenirs of a well-known customer. How many banquet programs the flier has autographed as mementos cannot even be guessed.

Despite the universality of souvenir-hunting, it is said that New York is probably the greatest stamping ground of them all. New York is such a large place that a stranger coming here for a little reflective hunting immediately loses his identity among all the others. Back home in Indiana he would not think of carting a piece of china away in his grip, but on a visit here it means nothing.

The hotels are ultimately the big losers. Even a souvenir hunter is faced by quite a problem when he tries to carry away a section of, say, the Woolworth Building or Grant's Tomb. But the objects in the hotels are smallish and they fit handily into baggage. Tiny cakes of soap and matches go as a matter of course; but how any one could carry away a collapsible bench—such as was taken from a hotel not long ago—must remain a mystery.

In the old days the tap rooms of hotels provided the country with steins; now the country is provided with porcelain candlesticks. These are undoubtedly acceptable as souvenirs. The hotels also set into circulation countless thousands of coat hangers, calendars, clothes presses and small mirrors. Undoubtedly many hundred copies of Gainsborough's "Blue Boy"—fortunately a diminishing stock in trade at every hotel—have gone the way of the china.

Occasionally — more than occasionally — some housewife with the happy gift of kleptomania visits New York and stocks up on linen. Sheets and pillow slips go, and innumerable towels. The Pullman Company is perhaps the greatest single contributor of towels, with hotel chains ranking next. In almost every private home across the land is at least one Pullman towel. Some, of course, have been taken by error; others have been wrapped around wet shaving brushes—and casually carted away.

The hotel dining rooms have also given more than their share to the service of the nation. Thousands of butter chips—they are small—disappear each month; and the items that are removed include such diverse objects as silver tea pots and carving knives. How they are removed successfully is a major mystery.

The beginning and the end of a hotel's life is when the souvenir hunters hunt most strenuously. They do it at the beginning so as to be able to show their friends they have been at the "newest"; and they do it at the end in order to possess a lasting memory. The old Waldorf was more torn apart by souvenir hunters than it was by the wreckers. Everything went.

It is sometimes customary—over the first few days and the last—to substitute for the usual china and silverware a second grade collection. This does not stop the hunting, but the hotel does not at once lose everything of value. And although the hotel, itself, may wish to keep its best things, the hunter seems to be just about as happy with the second best. Provided, that is, that a name is on it, or a picture, or something which may act as proof of its original identity.

WHILE souvenir hunters are of all ages, perhaps the most spectacular of the species are between 12 and 20. This explains why the rooms at Lawrenceville and Choate are lined with signs bearing such breathless titles as "Do Not Feed or Annoy the Animals," "No Smoking," "New York 24 Miles" and "No Help Wanted." Painted wooden signs are valued above tin, although either will do.

A glance into any room at Princeton, or Cornell, or Yale will show how the art of souvenir hunting has advanced. Where, three years before, its occupant had been content with "No Smoking," there is now the blasé "Quiet Is Requested for the Benefit of Those Who Have Retired." On the mantelpiece over the fire there is an elderly bottle with three stars, and a scar on the bottom where the three have been cut to two. Probably there are some corks from other bottles.

Other exhibits of this period will include clusters of flora that have been sanctified by contact with Her, and small sections of goal posts. The goal post has recently become one of the most profitable sources of ammunition for the collegiate souvenir hunter. Occasionally some undergraduate boasts a hat or club taken from an officer who vainly of our changing metropolitan world.

One is impressed on entering the living room with the architectural air suggested by the arrangement of the chairs, tables, bookcases and other furnishings. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that almost all the furniture incorporates the right angle in its design. It is true that the low backs of the four chairs placed about the small dining table at one end are semicircular in shape, but that is about the only concession to the curve in the entire interior. And yet there is no air of stiffness in the room. This effect is no doubt due to the variation in size and form of the furnishings and the studied lack of formal balance of masses true of the traditional style.

The general color tone of the room is set by the gray carpet laid from baseboard to baseboard, light gray walls, and woodwork painted in two tones of blue gray. The upholstery of the chairs is a new kind of monk's cloth in beige, the window curtains reflecting this same hue. Table, desk and dining chairs are in light maple. Accents are provided by the silver metal tubes that conceal and protect the radiators beneath the window seats at one end of the room and the deep rose of the upholstered seats of the dining chairs. A row of low bookshelves that aid in marking off one-third of the room as a sun room provide colors in the bookbindings; and these same decorative aids lighten up one side of the room back of the couch.

ARTIFICIAL illumination plays its part in preventing any sense of that monotony which with traditional furnishings is avoided through the use of varied upholstery design, patterns of wall and floor coverings, carvings or bright lacquer furniture. A tall, square pillar at one side of the room supports a sculptured head in heroic size on a stepped-back top of opaque glass, illuminated from within. Modern lamps—square shades of parchment supported by cubical bases of pottery—and a sheet of opaque glass in the ceiling above the dining table furnish other illuminating accents. Two or three black-and-white drawings in silver frames on the walls complete the decorative accessories.

This simplicity, which here makes for dignity and not, as in some cases, for aridness of effect, aids in keeping the room engagingly ample in size, although it is not a really large interior. The gray color helps, of course, and one also discovers that size is exaggerated by the straight lines of the furniture. Here the rectangular mode, which in pieces of modern furniture detached from their room setting often seems like an affectation and, indeed, may be, becomes useful as well as decorative. For if one is to utilize the maximum of floor space the right-angled end of a couch or the cubical mass of a phonograph cabinet logically accomplishes that end.

It is obvious that all the furniture in the room has been designed and built for the particular space it is to occupy. Thus, while there is present the compact effect of built-in furniture, many of the pieces suggest that they may be moved. A table desk has a broad thick board as the support of one end, while the other is sustained by a tall, narrow cabinet in which at the desk level are the customary pigeon-holes. At the back of the desk top against the wall is a sheet of dark brown cork with a curved monel metal shade above it for a wall light that provides soft illumination. Two settees make a corner seat on the slightly raised floor that forms the sun-room end of the interior. And yet the pieces of furniture fill their functions so well where they are placed that their position seems to be the inevitable one. This kind of modern apartment cannot have its furniture rearranged every six months because one is tired of the old way. But, on the other hand, the careful planning of design and placing of every piece makes for longer satisfaction with the arrangement in the room.

One of the most ingenious methods of conserving space and yet making it decorative is the device of having two rather large closets right in this living room. One is the tall, dignified pedestal for the sculptured head, the front of the pedestal opening on hinges. Another closet with sliding doors seems at first view an architectural end of the couch and also serves to screen the entrance door of the room. Part of the couch end is really a place for storage on the edge of the ubiquitous folding card table, and the built-up ledge along the back of the couch is a roomy cupboard.

It is in the details of arrangement and design that some of the most interesting points of this new approach to a room's furnishings are illustrated. The dining table has a metal stretcher on which one may rest his feet without fear of marring it; the handles of the cupboards and drawers are rectangular pieces of metal, unobtrusively decorative and in keeping with the straight lines of the pieces; the light gray background of the room provides a flattering setting for the clothing of any man or woman instead of clashing with their appearance.

Complementary to the living room in the general lines of its furniture is the bedroom. Here, however, color is introduced with the blue-green woodwork of the long, low headboard for the double bed which extends out each side so as to form a background for the two bedside tables. A mulberry carpet covers the floor and the walls are painted a soft yellow. The dressing table has a top of black glass with a light above it, opaque glass and monel metal being used. The relating of the mirror, dressing table and chest of drawers provides ease of use and creates an integrated appearance.

"MAD AS A HATTER" ORIGIN TOLD BY CHAMBERLAIN.

SIR AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, former British Foreign Secretary, has communicated to The London Times the origin of the phrase "mad as a hatter." It was thought that Thackeray invented it, for it appears in his novel "Pendennis," published originally in 1849. Sir Austen, however, alleges that the first man to be so designated was one William Henry Miller, elected to the House of Commons in 1830.

The story goes that Miller was carried bare-headed through the streets by his enthusiastic supporters after the declaration of the result of the voting and that the sun being hot that day he got a sunstroke which rendered him eccentric. Being a partner in the firm of hat manufacturers, Christys, he had bestowed upon him the sobriquet which now passes for a proverb. Miller had no objections to it at first, but Sir Austen is of the opinion that it became odious to him later.

MR. GRUNDY STATES HIS POLITICAL FAITH

The New Senator From Pennsylvania Sees Government as A Business Problem in Which the Citizen Has a Share

By S. J. WOOLF

AT 67 years of age, Joseph R. Grundy, after a lifetime of business, goes to Washington as a Senator from Pennsylvania. He has never before had a seat in either house of Congress. And yet in some ways it might be said that no one has ever entered Congress who was more familiar with its workings. No one has ever been sent to the National Legislature who has had the interests of his own State more at heart.

For years Mr. Grundy has been known in the capital as a lobbyist. No one has worked harder for a cause. In carrying out his plans he has come into contact with both the House and the Senate.

But to him there is no sudden jump between his former activities and his present ones, to his way of thinking. It is as much the duty of the citizen to take an active part in the affairs of government as it is for the officeholder, be he elected or appointed.

"We are all just human beings," he said, "and because a man dons the Senatorial toga, he is not changed, nor are his duties toward his country any more important as far as he himself is concerned than those of the humblest citizen when he or she is called upon to exercise the right of suffrage. After all, the Senate may be likened to a board of directors, or at least a committee of a board of directors who manage a great business. For the running of this country yearly becomes more a business problem. Methods of business have changed remarkably since I started in to work. Inventions, competition and new ideas have completely revolutionized all our ideas, and it is not to be expected that while all commercial enterprises are progressing, our National Government should stand still and conduct its business the way it did fifty or a hundred years ago."

When I saw him in his office in the Senate building the other day, Senator Grundy did not want to be interviewed or sketched, and there was no mock modesty about this. Had there not been an error in the understanding of some telegrams that passed between us, he would not have consented. As it was I had gone to Washington for the interview and the sketch. He had misinterpreted my wire and answered accordingly, and there I was in Washington with a large portfolio.

THE moment Mr. Grundy was assigned to his large, airy offices on the upper floors of the Senate Office Building, he began to make changes, and within a few days of his moving in a new, highly varnished partition had converted the outer waiting room into two offices.

His own private room is simply furnished; besides a large bookcase and the usual Senatorial desk in the centre, there were huge leather chairs. The desk lamp threw its light over innumerable copies of The Congressional Record, over great volumes of tariff rates and countless opened letters, and as I entered the new Senator looked up from one of the opened books before him.

No one can look into his beaming blue eyes behind his very shiny gold-rimmed spectacles and not feel the sincerity of the man. There is about him the air of one of those delightfully good-humored, good-natured characters whom Dickens described so well. He is one of those men who appear to be continually in good humor, whose ruddy complexions glisten with health and whose short-cropped mustaches and white hair sparkle.

A Quaker by birth, to his intimates he still uses "thee" and "thou"; in fact, there is something of that simplicity about him that one usually associates with members of the Society of Friends. His old-fashioned button shoes seem much more appropriate to him than do his striped shirts and collars.

Though in the recent lobby inquiry he made a pugnacious showing on the witness stand, Mr. Grundy is in fact a retiring man, almost shy. Like many shy people, he is willing to fight for what he thinks is right. On the other hand, he is much happier when he is not featured upon the first page of the newspapers.

"But I am not a regular Senator," he protested. "I have just been appointed temporarily, and I do not feel that, occupying such a position, I should give interviews."

He relented, however. There is something so kindly and generous about him that he posed for me—although to do so was against his better judgment and contrary to what he believed was the proper thing for an appointed Senator to do.

He told me something of his boyhood. He was born sixty-seven years ago in Camden, N. J. But it was in Pennsylvania that he spent his boyhood, and there all of his years since have been passed. His home is in Bristol, Pa., where his family moved in his young manhood, and there he lives with his sister at what is known as Walnut Grove Farm.

That is a section of the country rich in Revolutionary history. The Delaware River curves around and on its opposite shore is the sleepy old town of Burlington. Within a few miles of where he has his home Washington made his famous crossing. Today as he races through the country in a fast automobile, which he usually drives himself, he sees many of the same old houses still standing as they were years ago—for that part of the country has not changed much. It was here that he grew up and watched the smoke curling from the chimneys of the mills in the neighborhood. One of the mills belonged to his father, and after a year at college he returned to it as wool sorter.

With his love of country was instilled the belief that its prosperity and its future depended upon the black-smoked factories that dotted it.

"It is," said he, "primarily on the East that the condition of the whole country depends. How can the East, with all its manufacturing, be prosperous unless the manufacturers are protected by a tariff that will make it possible for them to compete with goods manufactured abroad, where the wages are so much lower than they are here? And unless the East is prosperous, how can the West expect to be?"

AS long ago as 1897, when the Dingley tariff bill was being drafted, he went to Washington to throw the weight of his influence on the side of protective rates. That was a long time ago; so long that there are few men now in Congress who were there at that time. Mr. Grundy, however, is still fighting for the same cause.

His interest, however, is not a selfish one. His wealth today, even in this period of large fortunes, is great, so that it matters little to him, in a way, what the rates are; it is for the benefit of the country that he feels he is working. In fact, since he has become Senator, he has refused to vote on what the tariff on woolen goods should be for fear that his position should be misunderstood.

"It is needless for me to say," he said, "that every intelligent man should take an active interest in politics. And when I say 'intelligent' I am not referring of necessity to the college graduate.

"As for myself, I went to college but one year, and that was a long time ago; but I believe that the world teaches a lot of subjects, in which there are no chairs at college. Rubbing elbows with men of all types and in all classes of society gives a boy much experience that he never gets in a classroom.

"The boy brought up in a small town where everybody knows everybody else, in many ways has the advantage over the boy in a large city whose acquaintances are likely to be restricted to young men of his own class. For this very reason, probably, you will find that, as a rule, the country boy takes a more active part in the political life of his community than the city boy.

"When the November came around during which I was entitled to cast my first vote, I was in Chicago; but in order to exercise what I had been taught was a sacred prerogative, I made the trip home. Incidentally, I held the election book."

I looked puzzled, and he noticed it. He lighted a cigarette and explained.

"That is, I had charge of the book in which all the voters' names were listed, and I checked them off as each one cast his ballot. That was forty-six years ago and for forty-five of those years I have held that book.

"It is from that interest in purely local affairs that a boy's interest grows. If he is active in local politics and has any 'chips in the game,' gradually he will become known in his county. Then, if he still has 'any chips in the game,' his name will become familiar to the people of his native State, and finally it will spread throughout the country."

Noticing his use of the expression "chips in the game," I asked him whether he played cards. He beamed.

"No," he replied. "I haven't had the time to learn. Nor golf, either. You see, most of my life I have had to run a business, and I have found that that takes not only a lot of time but also thought. I have not even had a chance to do much reading.

LIFE is not very long," he went on. "Now, don't tell me I am very young looking; I used to say the same to old fellows when I was younger. But I have had all I could possibly do in my work, and it has been in my business and in politics that I have found my relaxation. The 'tired business man' is one whose business is usually not a successful one."

A great aid to Mr. Grundy in carrying on that business has been the telephone. He is probably one of that company's best customers. It is said that he has consummated some of his largest deals over the instrument, and a telephone number once known to him is never forgotten. Not that he does not believe in personal interviews when they are possible, for during the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee, he himself called upon most of the 267 Republican members of the House.

As a politician, or, as he would say, for patriotic reasons, and because he believes in its principles, Mr. Grundy has given not only largely of his time, but also of his money, to the Republican party. Though he raised $700,000 for the Coolidge campaign fund and almost as much as that for Hoover, he has never asked anything for himself. He has done this because he felt that the Republican party would best serve the country.

For his home town he has also done much and the resolutions that it passed when he was named Senator are evidence of the regard in which he is held by his neighbors. I happened to see them—he did not show them to me—and from them I learned that Bristol has benefited to an amount considerably in excess of $500,000 from his benefactions. Not only did he give the town an entirely new and modern fire department, but he paid for the construction of a municipal building.

"If a man does not take pride in his own town, he isn't likely to give a rap for his country," he said to me. "I was brought up with old-fashioned ideas of doing right, fearing no man and loving my country, and I have tried to do all three.

"I could come to Washington when I did and say what I thought because I believe that the man who makes anything knows more about it than the 'experts' whose knowledge is based purely on theory. Why, even doctors learn more from their patients than they do from books. I would not care to trust my health to a man whose entire knowledge of human ailments was gained in a library. The man who does is the man who knows, every time."

MODERNIZING THE WALLS OF OUR HOMES

New Murals on Canvas And Use of Glass Lend Character To Apartments

A Rural Scene Designed as a Wall Background for Colonial Furniture.

Designed by Jan Juta. Photograph by Mattie Edwards Hewitt.

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY

THE decoration of walls, which has always been important in public buildings, recently has been gaining greater dignity and variety in private homes. Although our modern urban habits of life militate against the permanency that mural decoration traditionally implies, one may now have the painting done on canvas instead of directly on the plaster and thus move it with the rest of one's household goods to another domicile.

One may, moreover, have not only the traditional forms of pictorial decoration, such as the painted scenes from which the pictorial wall paper was derived, but painted glass and mirrors following and improving on the Venetian style. The contemporary modes include painting on mirrors with metallic colors, as was recently exhibited by Jan Juta at the newly opened Lucy Lamar Galleries; also the ornamentation with floral motives of a flat-toned wall in silver or dull gold, without any attempt made to create an all-over pattern. Painted mirrors for all the walls of a room, including even the doors—as in the dressing room exhibited by Victor White in the Lamar Galleries—provide a distinct note of luxury and sophistication.

The fashion for mirror walls, panels and overmantels is really part of that recent vogue for glass which both the modern decorator and he who follows traditions have recognized. To the designer in the contemporary mode especially, glass has been a most useful material. Accessories, such as glass ornaments, vases, figurines and other purely ornamental pieces, have new significance, as may be seen in the exhibition of the American Federation of Arts, recently at the Metropolitan Museum and now touring the country. In the forms of mirrors, table tops and etched sheets for windows, wall panels and shop fronts, glass has this season reached the greatest degree of popularity and artistry since its contemporary vogue began.

Mr. Juta's exhibition illustrated several of the new uses of glass. He has worked out a special process of painting with metallic pigments on the under surface of glass so that he achieves the effect of both metal and mirror glass. In several coffee tables, circular and with metal legs, he showed patterns in gold and silver and gun-metal hues. One table could be lighted up from beneath its crystal top, a sparkling effect thus being achieved. Mr. Juta believes that modern art has developed the natural affinity existing between glass and metal—substances of which the mechanical age has made much—and that it is therefore logical as well as esthetic for the two to be used together. His method of painting on glass with metallic colors—unknown in the past, for while the Venetians did a great deal of painting on glass they employed oil paints—develops this idea.

A beautiful screen of glass in this exhibition showed how even a traditional subject—courtiers and ladies in an Old World garden—could be modernized by being translated into this new mode of painting. A table with pedestals of copper and monel metal and a black glass top also presented this contrast of glass and metal. Even glass plates for the dining table were shown ornamented in black and silver and gold on the under side.

In the same display in the gallery were large sheets of mirror glass, decorated by Victor White and ready to be installed on the walls of a dressing room. These were painted on the under side in oil paints and depicted a fanciful landscape with animals. The top of the room in which they will be placed has a tent-shaped curved glass ceiling painted to represent green taffeta in conventional folds. The floor of the room will have a border around the centre rug—a delicate design of silver mirror on a gun-metal ground.

Overmantels of decorated mirrors by Mr. White also were displayed.

Large mirrors in a room always are dignified, especially when used as ornamentation above a fireplace mantel, where they provide a vista to the room and increase the dignity of the hearth ensemble. Possibilities of mirror glass as screens were illustrated in several examples—one a classic motif of vases and Grecian frieze design in gray and gold, and others displaying undersea motifs full of color. The pictorial bordering of a large panel mirror in the eighteenth century style, with quaint views of the pastimes of a Parisian of the day, struck the light note this form of ornamentation may achieve.

Wall decorations for interiors where a less luxurious effect is desired than decorated mirrors connote are provided in the painted walls developed by Mr. Juta, of which a number of photographs were on view in the exhibition. In a living room furnished in Colonial style the artist has been inspired by the old-time quiet landscapes used for wall decoration. This particular one showed on the four walls that framed the windows, doors and fireplace the country and manor life of a century and a half ago, when stage coaches sped swiftly along winding roads and over old stone bridges. Tall trees shade white farmhouses in this panoramic scene, and winding streams and a far-away ocean give other vistas to the pictured outdoors. The mural, as was the custom with the hand-painted wall decorations which preceded the printed wall-papers, extended from the low wainscots of wood that reached to the chair rail upward to the cornice of the room.

Other examples of Mr. Juta's work included a modern country house in France, where on plaster walls in the old-time fresco method painted directly on the plaster, a highly modernistic interpretation of modern city and country life was depicted. In a fourteenth century château interior he appropriately created in fresco a medieval landscape.

THE small apartment in which the living room is also the dining room, the study and the sun room is now the field of many experiments in interior decoration and in furniture design. Of course, it is not so much a problem if one has ample space—arranging a wide and long living room may only entail the problem of making a huge room cozy. But the smaller living rooms which are now the fashion in city apartments and are occasioned by the need to lighten housekeeping cares as well as by the modern economy of space sets up many difficulties, whose solution calls upon much of the older art of the interior decorator and all of the contemporary development in his field.

In this process of giving the living room new characteristics, the modern mode naturally is playing a large part. It is here if anywhere that the new style may be adequately judged on the basis of its practicability and flexibility in serving the metropolitan dweller who desires, as in every age, both beauty and comfort from his household surroundings. In an apartment—his own home—just completed by John Vassos, a designer and artist, whose recent book of symbolic drawings of New York, "Contempo," gives a modern interpretation of the city, is illustrated the ability of the new school of design to solve some of the problems

ARCHAEOLOGY SHEDS LIGHT ON THE BIBLE

An Expert Army, Sifting the Dust of Ages, Is Confirming The Ancient Story and Painting in Its Background

By P. W. WILSON

AMID a desert of dust and débris little groups of sunburned enthusiasts may be seen in Egypt, in Palestine, along the Euphrates, on the confines of the Sahara and in the heart of Athens itself, toiling year after year with a patience that endures discomfort and dares the sacrifice of health itself. Who are these strange men whose sole aim in life it is, apparently, to work like navvies in the dirt?

They are archaeologists, from the United States, from Great Britain, from France, from Germany, representing universities and museums and other organizations. Yesterday the archaeologist was an individual. Today he is mobilized into an army. He is a soldier of knowledge, waging war against the long-tolerated encroachments of oblivion. An insatiable Present, not content to claim the Future alone, is seeking also to conquer a rebellious and fugitive Past.

The archaeologist is a detective. Sheltered from the heat by a cork helmet, he directs companies of natives who dig trenches, excavate palaces, temples and fortresses and, undeterred by ancient curses that do not seem wholly to have lost their spell, delve impiously into the graves of the once illustrious dead. It is on the material evidence—a cup, a scrap of inscription, an engraved gem—that the archaeologist concentrates his gaze, and it is with eager care that he sifts the soil for potsherds and ornaments bearing the fingerprints of time.

The world asks the question, therefore, whether this persistent activity has been worth the results obtained. Is it mere antiquarian pedantry, or can we translate this pursuit of the past into human terms? There is one circumstance impossible to ignore. Beyond all contradiction, there has been no book so widely distributed, so devoutly read, so fiercely challenged, as the Bible; and what interests the public more than anything else is the fact that most of the excavation is proceeding in what we call the Bible lands. It is the background of the Bible, and especially of the earliest records in the Bible, that is emerging, slowly and surely, into an illuminated landscape.

For many years it has been a question whether Egypt or Chaldea was the cradle of civilization. It seemed as if nothing could be older than a culture which 5,000 years ago built the Great Pyramid and 3,500 years ago provided Tut-ankh-Amen with his tomb. But spade-work in Mesopotamia has revealed at last the truth. We now know that as Rome is recent compared with Egypt, so is Egypt, even archaic Egypt, recent compared with what now we call Babylonia. As Chicago, built in the nineteenth century, regards a city like Damascus, which was flourishing in the days of the patriarchs, so did the Pharaohs, who had yet to build their pyramids, regard the moldering antiquity of a Sumerian city like Ur of the Chaldees.

The first result of this archaeological outburst of energy is thus the addition of what we may call a preface of, say, 5,000 years to that volume of history the amplitude of which already delights the boy and girl at school. All of us have learned about Spain and Russia and Poland. So, in the future, shall we have to learn about Chaldea, Assyria and the Hittite Empire.

Mount Carmel, standing sentinel over the Mediterranean, where Elijah confounded the prophets of Baal and Elijah's servant saw a cloud arise like a man's hand, contains caves where rude pictures reveal the art of prehistoric man. So began the drama—a Garden of Eden beyond the Euphrates Valley—and gradually the excavator is restoring legend to the realm of fact. Here, in the Mesopotamian desert, we find huge deposits of mud. Dig into that mud, drain it with motor pumps, and far below the surface you reach strata of successive human habitations.

This superimposed deposit demonstrates that Mesopotamian civilization has been swept by floods much more destructive than inundations in the Mississippi Valley. Such a deluge buried the earliest city of Kish under ten feet of soil. A second city was built and, in turn, it also was submerged, only to be reached today at a depth of forty-five feet. It was the second flood that, presumably, may have produced Noah, and the recovery of inscribed tablets, to be deciphered, may indicate the actual date of this calamity. In view of the earlier flood, Noah's prescience and his precautions, however poetic be the description of them, are within the possibilities of ascertained history.

Tradition, even if distorted, is drawing back the truth to itself. The migrants into Chaldea descended from the hills and found themselves on a plain, dead level, flat as a pancake. To them, the monotony of that horizon was unendurable, and they sought to relieve it by developing towers of Babel that should reach unto heaven. These terraced temples preceded the pyramids of Egypt and familiarized the world with a design that seems to have reached Yucatan. With the Chaldeans, therefore, architecture on the grand scale of magnitude was an immemorial heritage. We used to be told that the arch was invented by the Romans. But 3,000 years before Rome was founded, the arch and the dome were constructed with skill by the builders of Ur, and there is an arch, antedating Rome by 2,000 years, which was included by the Sumerians of Nippur in a drain.

The Babylon of Nebuchadrezzar, with its vast adornments and fortifications, was thus the product not only of unlimited reserves of slave labor, but of an engineering experience accumulated over thousands of years. When he built the famous hanging gardens for his wife, Amuhia, it was because she, like men and women entering Mesopotamia before the flood, yearned for her native mountains of Media. Those hanging gardens were the Tower of Babel translated into feminine terms.

It was, then, in Ur of the Chaldees, already as ancient as London, Paris and Rome are today, and, considering the state of civilization, as magnificent, that the patriarch Abraham grew up as a boy. There dwelt his father, Terah, and his brother, Nahor. There he married his wife, Sarai, and there was born his nephew, Lot. He was no mere Bedouin sheik, bred to the nomadic life, but a man immersed in the most elaborate erudition of his period; and the question is why his family abandoned such an environment. What were the circumstances, compelling as a divine call, which drove forth Terah and his family from the comforts of the towns to the hazards of the tent? It has been suggested that Abraham fled from the calamities of war. In the Scriptural accounts there is no hint of this, and archaeology furnishes what may prove to be a simpler and more poignant solution of the riddle.

The Chaldeans were no monsters. As neighbors of Abraham they were people of our own flesh and blood. It is literally the fact that in this twentieth century we could cook our food on the very stove which, with its flues, served the kitchen of their impressive temple, and the well is there as they left it. We could take a board, inlaid by their art with shell and silver, and play the game of checkers which was familiar to those Mesopotamians. In its museum the University of Pennsylvania preserves a sceptre in bronze wielded by King Dunga which might be held by our kings as a sceptre or by our marshals as a baton. Their babies, like ours, waved the rattle. By rare fortune, there has been found intact the model of a silver yacht, with oars and canopy and high stern and prow, designed as boats are to be seen to this day, gliding over the broad waters of the Tigris and Euphrates.

We are familiar with the famous orchestra of Nebuchadrezzar, with its "cornet, flute, sackbut, psaltery and harp." All of us have read of the instruments, enumerated in the last of the Psalms, the Hallelujah Chorus of lyric verse, and with the harps which the exiled Israelites hung on the willow trees, so called, by the waters of Babylon. But what we now know is that, thousands of years before Nebuchadrezzar and the Israelite exile, the Chaldeans were demanding songs. From impressions in the mud, an authentic harp has been reconstructed which, with its inlaid jewelry and golden head of a bearded bull, was old before Abraham was born.

A curious tablet has been discovered which, if correctly interpreted, contains a song set to music. It appears to suggest that the harp had twenty-two strings, that its scale was pentatonic, without semitones, and that chords were used. Here, then, is a tradition of melody and harmony that can be traced direct from the period of the Flood and of the Tower of Babel, through David and the Psalmists, to Mendelssohn and Brahms. Deep is the meaning of the saying in Genesis: "Tubal was the father of such as handle the pipe and the organ."

About the culture of the Chaldea in which Abraham spent his childhood there is now no question. From the wreckage there have been recovered beautiful goblets of fluted gold, beautiful pictures of chariots and horses, of soldiers in armor and of the feast. The trouble was that this culture was accompanied by cruelty. It was a cruelty to us incredible, and against the cruelty of Chaldea Abraham initiated a revolt that has changed the course of history.

In the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen, death itself was refined into a delight. The corpse is embalmed. Arrayed in royal robes, the departed monarch is accompanied into the next world by images representing his servants, his courtiers, his animals.

But in Ur of the Chaldees we see the original and awful rites of which the Egyptian refinements of a later date were no more than a revised version. In the prolific romances of Rider Haggard there are grim visions of what was meant in days of long ago by the pagan ceremonial which accompanied the burial of monarchs. But fiction itself has never devised a spectacle more appalling in its human significance than the tomb of King

The Migrants Into Chaldea, Finding Themselves on a Level Plain, Sought to Relieve the Monotony of the Horizon "by Developing Towers of Babel That Should Reach Unto Heaven."

MODERNISTIC CACTUS

FOR the last three or four years we have been in the midst of a cactus revival. Why, with the abundance of the fertile regions of the earth to pick from, we should turn to the desert's meagre flora is a question that puzzles those who refuse to become cactus-minded. Others are ready enough with explanations of the vogue. Cacti solve the problem of those who wish a plant in the living room, yet are too much pushed by the rush of present-day living to bother with its care; cacti excuse their keepers from the daily watering act; a drink now and then does them very well, and so little nourishment do they require that they subsist indefinitely on the same portion of soil.

Again, it is pointed out that just now these grotesque plants fit into up-to-the-minute schemes of decoration. In their bizarre forms is a quality peculiarly akin to the modernist feeling and entirely in harmony with its expression. Cacti seem to belong with metal furniture and sharp angles and queer curves of design; and so to mere lovers of the unusual in general are now added adherents of the modern mode as admirers of cacti.

The horticulturist goes even deeper than these interpretations. Popular interest in cacti, he explains, is a thing that proceeds in cycles. Now some one starts the fashion, it readily takes hold, the market is full of spiny stalks and globules, everybody goes in for cacti for a spell; then presently the strange plants disappear gradually from corner and conservatory, and one hears no more of cacti for a while. The latest revival before the present one reached its height in 1912.

This condition is fast being remedied, however. Dealers who at first could offer only what was available in their immediate sections are building up more varied stocks, and horticultural trade journals are filled with advertisements of new companies with growing lines and new collectors willing to pay handsomely for choice specimens. They have much to work with, since more than 300 species are now under cultivation in the United States. Nor is the interest confined to this country. European nurserymen, too, it is said, are busily inquiring about sources of supplies of seeds, cuttings and plants in quantity.

DURING its intervals of popularity the cactus is a thing people collect, as stamps are collected, or coins or old furniture. The growing company of collectors, together with the vastly greater numbers of those who buy a few plants as subscribers to a fashion, account for the wave of the cactus revival. They are prompted by the decorative value of the plant's symmetry and coloring and the curious ways that differentiate it from all other growing things.

The fruit of the cactus is a staple in the diet of some peoples. In certain sections of Mexico the poorer natives are dependent upon it, and in many places it is grown for the market and bought by all classes. The species known as tuna, varying widely in color, flavor and size, are mostly so used. The inner pulp, containing the seed, has not only a pleasant flavor but also the virtue of creating an impression of coolness even in the hottest weather.

In the neighborhood of San Luis Potosi and Aguascalientes tons of the fruit of a native wild species are used every year for the preparation of preserved products. After the pulp has been removed, the seeds are separated out by means of a crude colander; then the juice is evaporated to different degrees of consistency. A beverage which may or may not be fermented also is prepared from the tuna fruits. Some are peeled and dried in the sun like figs, and some are pickled. So diverse are these fruits that a native may live a month or two on scarcely anything else.

Meskalam-dug at Ur, which the archaeologist has revealed to an astonished twentieth century.

Whether this monarch died a natural death, who knows? The fear was, of course, that if the monarch so died, the cattle of the country, to say nothing of the children, would die with him. A king, when sick, was apt suddenly to receive his quietus. However that may be, the obsequies of this king were a massacre and, to this day, his sepulchre is a shambles. At an age, estimated to have been 28 years, and in all the loveliness of her youth, there lies his queen, Shub-ad, a wonderful chaplet of golden leaves on her head, bracelets on her arms, rings on her fingers and a beaded corset clasped at her shoulders. Thus arrayed she was killed by a stroke on her skull.

AROUND her there are grouped her women, a dozen of them, with traces still remaining of their finery and shells at their side with cosmetics; yet stunned to death with a blow. Six sentinels, accoutred in their helmets, keep guard over her mausoleum, every one of them clubbed to death by a remorseless etiquette. The very oxen who drew their wagons into the sanctuary of distress, there ended a humble career. The hideous sequel to a tragedy, so appalling must be left to the imagination.

Such an atrocity stamps the civilization that permitted it, and if Abraham emigrated from Ur of the Chaldees, we can surmise an excellent reason. Reform was hopeless; the only plan was to escape. Abraham's idea, therefore, was to find a new country in which he could start life afresh. Avoiding the desert, he made his way to Damascus, and through Syria to Palestine, southward also as far as Egypt, then back again to the Holy Land.

Hence, we are faced by a further question. Why was it that this patriarch, seeking a home, could not find one? Why, as a wanderer, did he fail to discover any country where, in peace and safety, he could dwell under his own vine and his own fig tree? Has archaeology any answer to give to that conundrum?

"Abraham Did Not Plunge Into the Vacancy of a Veldt or the Open Spaces of a Prairie. On the Contrary, He Entered Territories Already Occupied and Developed."

In Scripture there are a number of casual allusions to a people called the Hittites. Most readers of the Bible have supposed that the Hittites, like the Hivites and the Perizzites and the rest of them, were an obscure tribe, living possibly in the mountains, and anyway insignificant. Hence, the surprise when the archaeologist arrived with the news that, for ten long centuries, the Hittite Empire shared with Egypt and Babylon the government of the ancient world. Ninety miles from Angora, the present capital of Turkey, there has been discovered the royal library of the Hittites, containing no fewer than 20,000 tablets, closely inscribed in cuneiform characters.

For 3,000 years here has been a dead language, but, like the hieroglyphics on the Rosetta Stone, it has been deciphered, and the formidable task of translating what may be described as a Congressional Record, is proceeding. Already there is found a mention of Atreus, King of the Achaeans, who appears in Homer as the father of Agamemnon, the leader of the Greeks against Troy. The reputed date of that notable siege is confirmed by the Hittite record.

"The Destruction of a Former Jericho Has Been Demonstrated."

Having left Chaldea behind, therefore, Abraham did not plunge into the vacancy of a veldt or the open spaces of a prairie. On the contrary, he entered territories already occupied and developed. Many sites are being uncovered, and among the triumphs of archaeology has been the excavation of the great fortress of Betshan, facing Nazareth, which, in the patriarchal period, was the Egyptian Gibraltar. Here was one of those cities, walled unto heaven, that in due course was so greatly to discourage all the Israelitish spies, except Joshua and Caleb.

The decision to be made by Abraham was thus simple. Was he or was he not to join himself unto "the people of the land?" By settling in Sodom, the nephew of Abraham, Lot, answered that question in the affirmative, and with disastrous results. But Abraham determined still to stand aloof from his environment. His only dealing with the Hittites was the purchase of a cave at Macpelah, close to Hebron. That property was sold to him by Ephron the Hittite. It became the tomb of the patriarchs, and as such it is closely guarded to this day by the Arabs.

Why did Abraham persist thus obstinately in his isolation? The people of Palestine were not all evil. We read of a certain mysterious Melchizedek, King of Salem, who brought bread and wine to Abraham and blessed the patriarch in the name of the most high God, since which gesture of courtesy this "King of Peace," described as "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life," has been revered as the high priest of a gracious hospitality. Was Melchizedek mythical? On the contrary, the excavator has revealed the wall of a Jerusalem, older by many centuries than the Jebusite city which David captured, a Jerusalem that was ancient long before Abraham was born, and the remains include shrines for worship. It is the Salem of Melchizedek.

But the very distinction accorded to this kindly king suggests that his courtesy was exceptional. The ideal for which Abraham strove was not the ideal of the peoples around him. We read that, in due course, Esau married two Hittite wives, and so great was the "grief of mind" to his parents that Rebekah said wearily, "If Jacob takes a wife of the daughters of Heth, what good shall my life do me?" At a later date, it was Bathshebah, the wife of Uriah the Hittite, who fascinated a mature David and became at once the mother of Solomon and, as such, an influence on his luxuriant era.

CUSTOMS, even inhuman customs, are not easy to change. Thousands of years after the funeral of King Meskalam-dug at Ur, an Alexander the Great, there in this self-same Babylonia, was to dignify the mausoleum of his general, Hephaestion, with sanguinary "games," while the waters of the Danube were to submerge the grave of Attila the Hun, and with it, the slaves who dug the grave. In India, suttee is a recent memory, and when the late Emperor of Japan died, a noble committed hara-kiri.

Abraham's challenge to custom, therefore, could not be made good in his own lifetime. At Ur of the Chaldees he had been shocked by the obscene rites, perpetrated as the worship of Istar, the goddess of love. But in the buried city of Bethshan, existent in Abraham's day, the archaeologist has discovered the corresponding altar to Ashtaroth, the same goddess as Ishtar, whose "abominations" on every "high hill" distressed the Israelite idealists (not always the people) for centuries. By awful illusions, the mind of Abraham himself was still affected, and on Mount Moriah, quite close to the capital of King Melchizedek, he bound a youthful Isaac to a terrible altar. Only after much agony of soul did the patriarch abandon the notion that parents should pass their children through the fire to those deities, of which an example was Moloch, and it is significant that his merciful emancipation of mind was followed, years later, by a Babylonian inscription declaring

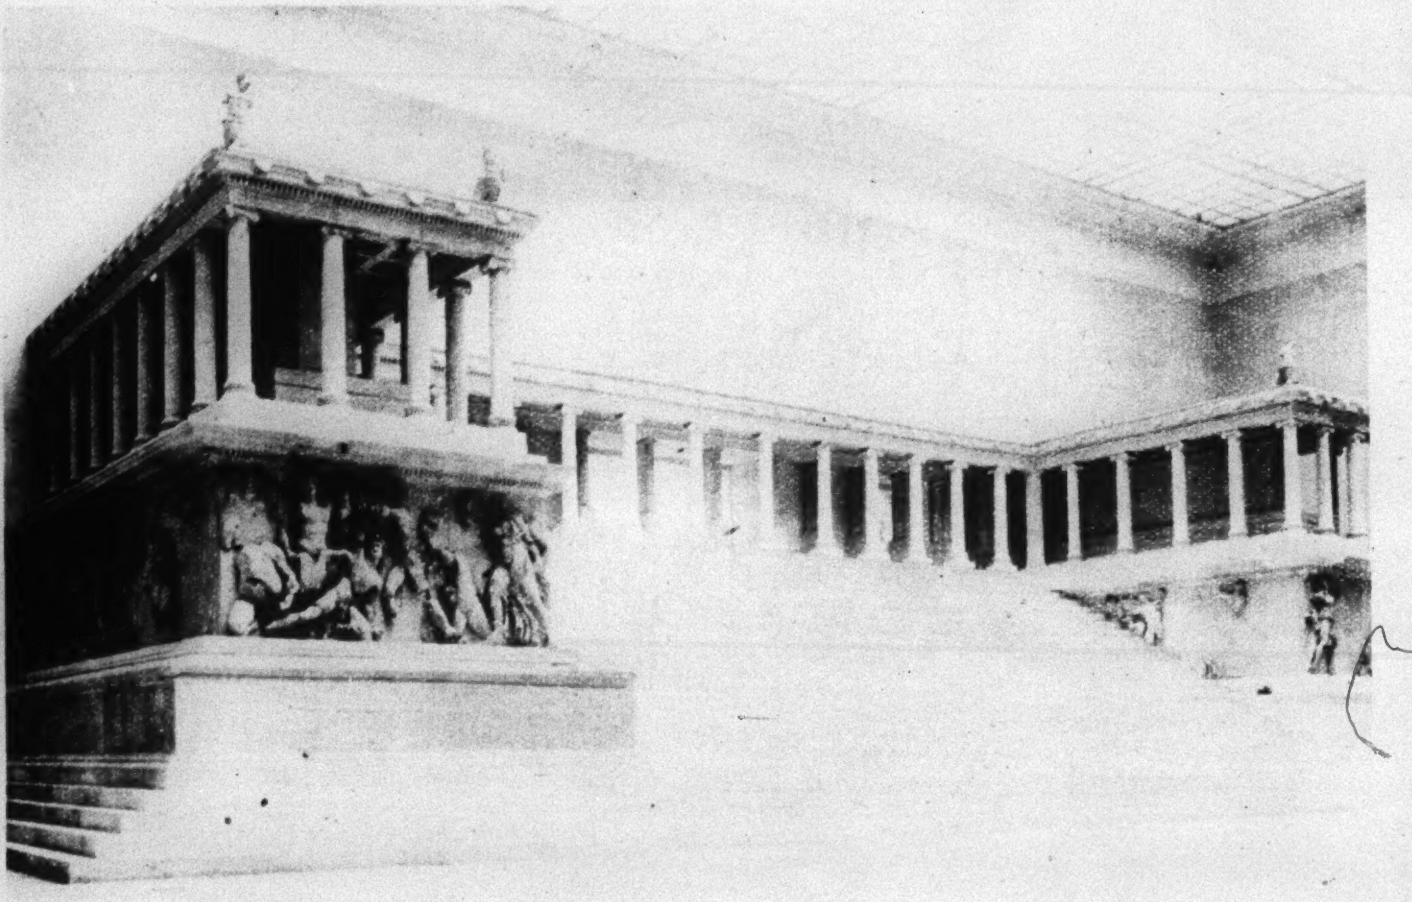
A VAST HALL OF ANCIENT ARCHITECTURE

Pergamon's Altar Is A Treasure of the New Museum In Berlin



The Great Altar of the Temple of Zeus Reconstructed for the Pergamon Museum in Berlin.

THE kings of Pergamon in Asia Minor flung back the barbarian Gauls when the young, far-scattered empire that Alexander had founded was in danger, and won the accolade of "defenders of the Greek race." They had saved the great second flowering of Grecian art, the Hellenistic age. In honor of their triumph the kings of Pergamon called the foremost sculptors and architects of the day to make fitting memorials. Many of the superb temples they created have gone the way of all antiquity in the course of the centuries. But some remain. And this year one of the most magnificent of them, the great altar of the Temple of Zeus, will reappear in the first purely architectural museum in the world, the Pergamon Museum in Berlin.

There, in a building now being completed on a scale that makes other museums small, with other examples of architecture by great architects of antiquity, ranging from the sixth to the second century B. C., the Pergamon altar will re-create for our time the brilliance of late Hellenistic art as the Parthenon does for the classic age of Greece.

In a sense, the museum is a memorial to Alexander. His empire was more than the venture of a conqueror. He was the son of Philip—but he was the pupil of Aristotle. He opened new lands, he created a new world. Villages in Asia Minor and along the north coast of Africa that he drew into his dominions became the foremost centres of the day in art, in literature, in politics. They grew quickly. It was a profligate age. Everything was possible. Experiment with new forms, refinement on the old forms of Athens was rampant. Athens was waning. It had become a city without hope, its politics in desuetude. Its artists went to new lands. There they created Hellenistic civilization with the inspiration of new themes, with the unlimited gold of treasuries of kings who were patrons of the arts first and foremost.

But what do we know of those cities today? The darkness of dissolution came, centuries of dust have gathered over their greatness, time has destroyed and obliterated. We know comparatively little of the art of the other cities that Alexander founded. Only luminous scraps and fragments remain. Broken statues incomparably wrought, vases, splintered columns, copies and considered copies, stray references to stirring grandeur in ancient writings, all calling vivid attention to an irreparable void of knowledge. Antioch is a golden legend, Rhodes is a scholar's memory, Alexandria one of the bright enigmas of all time. But the altar of the temple of Pergamon, taken from a State that was one of the smallest and proudest and most advanced of Alexander's cities, remains.

What do we know of the resplendent civilization in Pergamon which created these sculptures? The written record is slim. Ampelius, a Roman, placed among the wonders of the world "the great marble altar at Pergamon." The earliest mention stirs memories of "old unhappy far off things and battles long ago." For in 399 B. C. Xenophon and the scarred survivors of the Ten Thousand straggled into Pergamon just before they were taken over by the Spartan General Thimbron to help the Ionian Greeks against the Persian provincial governors.

XENOPHON himself was very hospitably entertained by a Greek family of considerable standing who may possibly have been the rulers of Pergamon. At the time the town was not large or important in the Mediterranean world. There are a few inscriptions mentioning Pergamon. But no prophecy of the magnificent city that was to rise.

Then, in the great year 323 B. C., the year of Alexander's death and the division of his far-flung empire among his old Generals, Pergamon and the lands around it were given to Lysimachos. He looked at his heritage and found it excellent. High on a hill near the sea, between the valleys of two rivers, overlooking a wide fertile region, Pergamon was the predestined capital. Lysimachos had amassed a great quantity of treasure. He placed it in the acropolis at Pergamon, and gave a certain Philetairos charge over it. But neither Lysimachos nor his treasurer, who followed him, were among the great kings of Pergamon.

Philetairos left his domain to his nephews, Eumenes and Attalos. They were the founders of the dynasty of the Attalids that was in the course of 100 years to make Pergamon the most powerful State in Asia Minor.

Attalos I, who ruled Pergamon in the second half of the third century B. C., was the king who began the great enterprises in art as a memorial to his smashing victories over the destroying Gauls.

The barbarians had been harassing the South of Europe and the perilous coasts of Asia Minor for more than two centuries. In 279 B. C. three large bands of these Gauls appeared in Greece. The King of Bithynia invited an immense band of them to cross into Asia Minor. They spread terror everywhere. Tall as giants to the Grecian people, red-maned and fair-skinned, smeared with chalk as war paint, the Gauls swept on. The King of Syria marched against them and his thundering war elephants threw their ranks into confusion. But the check was temporary. They gathered themselves for fresh assaults on the Pergamese. Then it was that Attalos sent his armies against them, and in decisive victories flung back the destroying tide.

Now Attalos began the celebration of those victories in imaginative creations that stand today as the finest examples of late Hellenistic art. He had been called the defender of the Greek race. And his first gesture was toward Athens. There, on the Acropolis, he dedicated a votive offering of statues. There were four groups, commemorating the victories over the Gauls, the battles of the gods and the giants, and the victories of the Athenians over the Persians and the Amazons. The vicissitudes of time have swept most of them into oblivion. Ironically, of those that may still be traced, it is the defeated that survive. The famous statue of the Dying Gaul—long considered a dying gladiator and so celebrated by Byron—was probably one of these.

Under Eumenes II the court at Pergamon became the centre of art and learning in Asia Minor. Eumenes was the son of a fabulously rich Oriental king and a Greek mother. Everything that Oriental riches and Greek good taste could achieve together was done. Temples, palaces, market places, porticoes, gates, statues, a theatre, a museum and a great library can even now be traced in the ruins of that resplendent age. The Kings of Alexandria knew that their rival was overtopping them. In envious dislike they forbade Egyptian papyrus to the splendid library of Pergamon. Thereupon the Pergamese turned to discover a better paper, and in that quest it came about that they invented parchment.

THE great altar was probably built by Eumenes II. He also had fought and defeated the Gauls. The whole surface of the wall was covered by a frieze of figures above life size, running around the three sides and returning to the immense open flight of steps in the centre. An Ionic colonnade stood above the cornice. The thirteen openings between the columns led to the inner court where another wall surrounded the altar of sacrifice.

The Gigantomachy, the battle of the giants and the gods, symbolic of the deliverance of the civilized Grecian people of Asia Minor from the barbarians, is the heroic subject of the frieze. Many lesser divinities from the lore of the poets and the antiquarians stand among the major figures. They are grouped in accordance with their rank or traditional position fighting the greater number of giants. Grotesque figures, some of them

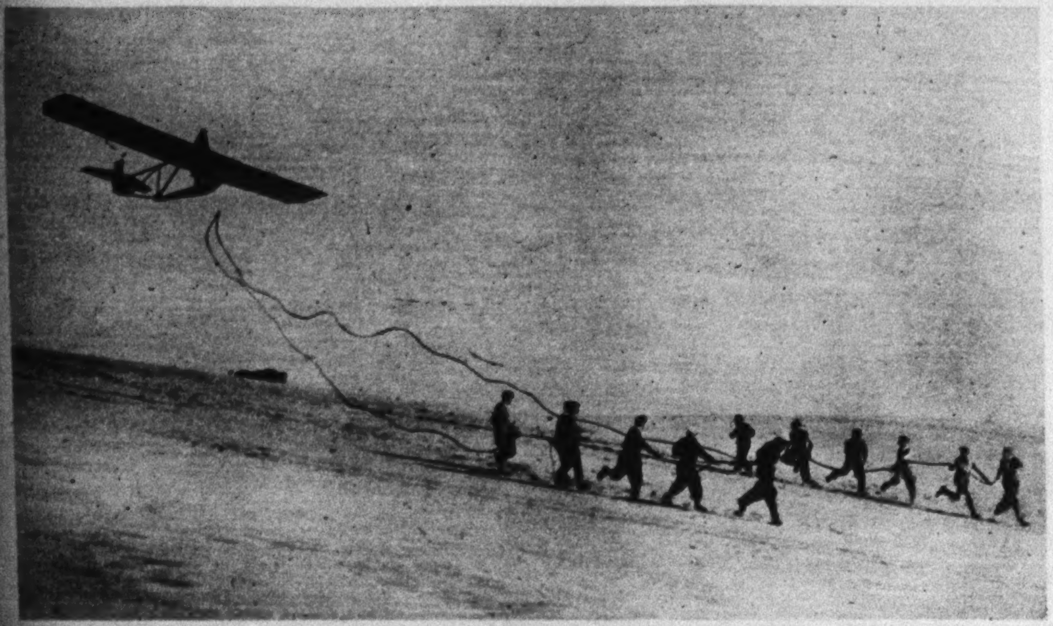
THE GLIDER LEAVES SPORT FOR UTILITY

Flight From an Airship Indicates a New Future in Aviation for the Motorless Airplane



The Take-Off: Twelve Men Launching a Glider From a Hill.

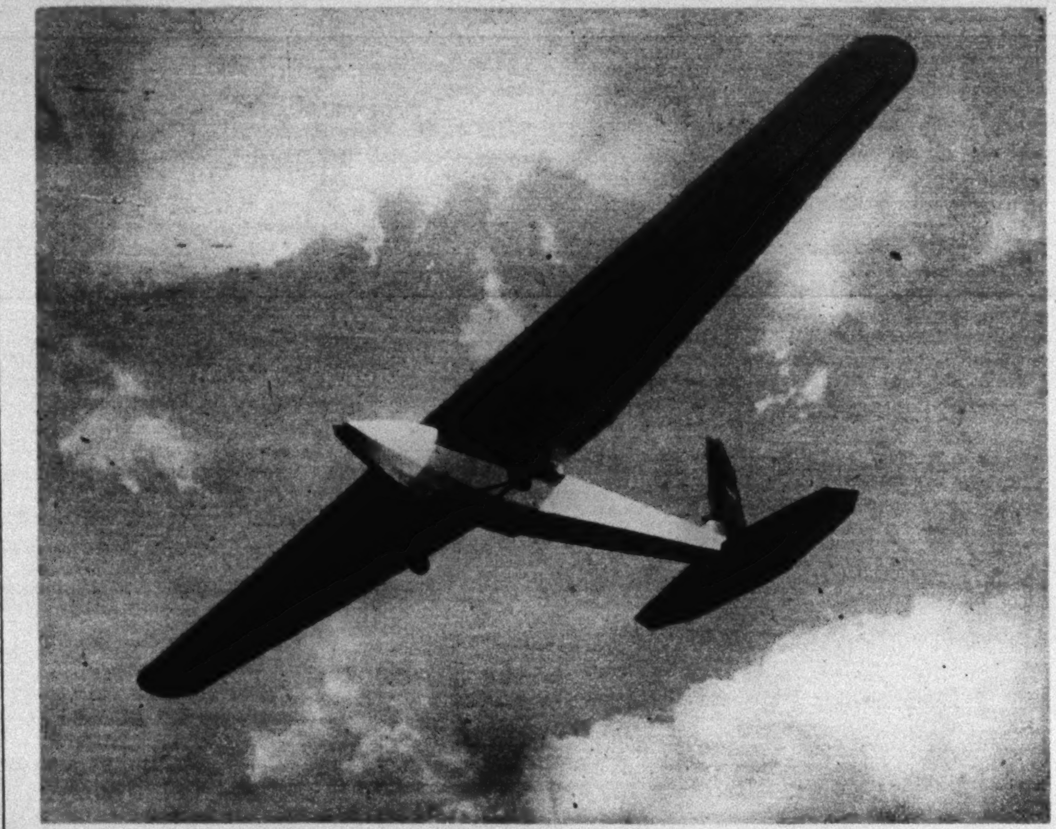
By T. J. C. MARTYN

FOR the first time in the history of aeronautics a flight has been made in a motorless glider from a dirigible in flight. And for the first time possibilities loom for the use of gliders in military and commercial aviation. For despite the romantic and highly important rôle gliders played in the evolution of the airplane—really a powered glider—they have survived chiefly as vehicles of sport. Now, however, a change in their future seems to be drawing near.

Let us imagine that one day huge dirigibles, perhaps even bigger than those now being constructed by the United States Government, are flying on regular routes between New York, London, Paris and Berlin; and to the West, between New York, San Francisco and Tokio. Since dirigibles of this size could carry many tons of mail they would be mail and passenger carriers, much as are the sea liners of today, and they would have most of the conveniences and all the luxuries of an ocean liner, as has the British airship R-101 today.

Let us suppose that a business man is making a trip from New York to Tokio. Just past Chicago he is called to the telephone by his New York office. Urgent reasons compel him to return post-haste, the conversation develops. The business man consults his aerial time-table and finds that the airship Aeolus from Tokio is due to pass the Icarus in which he is flying within an hour. Two courses are open to the business man. Either he can take an airplane and fly from one dirigible to another, or he can take a glider to an airport and there take an airplane to connect with the Aeolus in flight. Unfortunately, an airplane is not available, so he descends a hatchway, and steps through the hatch into a waiting glider and is piloted down to earth. Transferring to a powered plane he is born swiftly upward to the Aeolus, and some seven or eight hours later he is back in New York.

All this scientific progress has brought well within the realm of the possible. But why use a glider when an airplane is so much more convenient? Airplanes, even light ones, have heavy engines and in addition, must carry heavy loads of fuel besides many heavy engine accessories. The carrying of them forces the designers to strengthen the structure of the plane and again add to its weight. Thus the elimination of the engine and its accessories, of its oil and gasoline, makes it possible to build a glider far lighter than any airplane could be built and, therefore, the glider becomes an ideal craft for a dirigible—or a big plane—to carry. If it has folding wings, it might conceivably be stored within the envelope of an airship or the body of a plane. Because of their weight it may prove to be uneconomical for an airship to carry airplanes, although they doubtless will always be able to attach themselves to and take off from a dirigible in flight.



In Flight: A Modern Glider Soaring High in the Air.

Photograph by Times Wide World.

Let us assume that you are making a trip in a big flying boat from New York to Berlin. A friend of yours telephones from the steamship Leviathan underneath that he is returning to New York, and that there are weighty reasons why you should be there with him. You notify the airship purser that you wish to transfer to the Leviathan. Speedily he makes the necessary arrangements and notifies the captain of the Leviathan. Within ten minutes, with a small suitcase on the floor beside you, you are being taken down in a glider to the ocean liner, to land on its deck.

NOTHING like this has ever been attempted, but doubtless one day it will be accomplished. If so it is highly probable that the glider alone will make it possible. It would be manifestly impossible for a small airplane to leave or attach itself to even a big flying boat in flight; but the glider, by reason of its lightness, lends itself to this kind of work.

In war gliders might be used for the transfer of personnel from airship to sea ship, but it will be the airplanes that will transfer them from warship to dirigible. In an emergency gliders might be used as couriers to carry special information to a flagship on the ocean, where the information was too valuable to risk sending it by radio or where the radio has been put out of commission. Gliders would seem, apart from their possible uses, to be strictly limited for use in war; but this limitation would largely depend upon the utility of the airship as a weapon in a future conflict. That is not now easy to decide.

In conjunction with the airplane there is still another possible use for the glider. Both in Germany and in this country experiments have been made to use airplanes in much the same way as a locomotive is used to pull trains. That is, one airplane would tow a number of gliders, each having its own pilot and carrying either passengers or mail. Thus, some time in the future, an aerial train may be made up for a continuous flight, say, from Los Angeles to Vancouver. The large gliders are behind. One is marked San Francisco, one Seattle, the other Vancouver. When over San Francisco the pilot of the first glider would unhitch and glide down to earth, and the remainder of the train would fly on to Seattle, to repeat the process there, and later on at Vancouver.

As to the practicability of aerial trains, not much is at present known. Theoretically, they are possible, at least for mail, and there is the advantage of enabling the locomotive airplane to carry much larger quantities of fuel than would be the case if it were carrying a large pay load of passengers or mail.

Finally, there is the possibility of using gliders in dirigibles and big airplanes as lifeboats. But there are parachutes, which have been many times used successfully from both airships and airplanes. The one great advantage which the glider has over the parachute is that it is manoeuvreable while in the air, which the parachute, except to a minor degree, is not. Against that, however, is the corresponding disadvantage that a parachute can be launched in the twinkling of an eye—merely by the person using it jumping and pulling the rip cord. To launch a glider might take several minutes, and seconds are too often eternities in the air.

After more than 100 years of evolution, the glider is being put to the test for purposes more useful than sport and teaching student pilots to fly. It seems, therefore, that a new future is opening for it and that its utility, in whatever way it is finally manifested, in commercial and military aviation, will first be measured by the acid test of experience.

IF the glider is used in commercial and military operations, it will always be from a height. Released from a dirigible or from an airplane, a glider must descend because it is heavier than the air and has no engine to give it any speed of its own other than the speed which is derived by gravity tugging it back to earth. It is thus in exactly the same situation as an airplane with its engine off, and it is controlled in the air and landed in exactly the same way, except in landing its speed is very much slower than that of an airplane, since it is much lighter. But, considered apart from sport gliding, it cannot fly at all unless it is first taken to a height and released and is therefore dependent upon some form of powered aircraft.

What may be called sport gliding is another matter. A century ago men attached a glider to their body and ran with it, making short hops when the speed became great enough and landing, after a few yards of flight, on their feet. Otto Lilienthal made the first round-trip flight in a glider, toward the end of the last century. That is a memorable milestone in the annals

Here, in a setting of peace and beauty, Memorial Abbey will offer the finest provisions that you can make for those dearest to you. The departed who are here placed to rest will be forever protected . . . forever honored. Here you will find new contentment in your heart, knowing that you could not have planned protection more lasting or more beautiful. And the cost is so moderate!

Memorial Abbey represents the finest development in the age-old tradition of erecting mausoleums for protecting the departed and perpetuating their memory. Built of marble and granite and bronze, it will stand through the ages, an assurance of undisturbed peace . . . providing one of the most beautiful mausoleums erected during recent years. (Its magnificent design has earned citation in the "American Architect".)

Thoughtful of Others

Those who remain to remember will always have the beautiful memory of a noble edifice, radiant with light . . . inspiring . . . serene. They will be sheltered against the wind, and the rain, and the weather of all seasons. (Memorial Abbey will be heated in winter). Memorial Abbey is most conveniently located.

Who is to Decide?

How often have you said to yourself "I am thankful that my family is taken care of . . . no matter what happens . . ." Are you sure that your family is taken care of? Has the final resting place been chosen? Who is to choose it? When? At the time the need for it arises? Can anyone make a wise decision quickly on such an occasion? And your own peace of mind as far as your own provisions are concerned . . . where will you be placed to rest? You are the best one to decide upon the interment place. NOW is the best time to settle this important question for all time.

Underneath every love that endures, there lies friendship.

Marriage, without friendship, is wrecked by time.

If love is a religion, then friendship is the philosophy one can live by.

When Charles Kingsley was asked how he had succeeded so greatly he answered, "I had a friend."

One climbs out of the dark valleys to the mountain-top because at the darkest and weariest moments a friend has reached out and touched you healingly, a friend, with his priceless gift of seeing with the heart rather than with the eyes, has looked into your eyes and saluted the strength in you.

Love demands, but friendship is no more concerned that it gets back in some measure that which it gives than is the sun concerned that a sky be provided for it to ride across.

Poets have immortalized friendship in verse. Philosophers have meditated on it in painting. Composers have made it the theme of deathless music.

But it has remained for Elizabeth Arden to symbolize the unutterable beauty of friendship in fragrance.

In her exquisite perfume "Mon Amie Elizabeth," Miss Arden has immortalized all the true and tender feeling of this glorious human emotion. There is a depth, subtlety, a rich warmth in this precious odor that has never before been duplicated.

The perfect gift of a friend to a friend.

As friendship is the natural forerunner of joy — of dreams — so Miss Arden's perfume "Mon Amie Elizabeth" leads the way for two perfect odors "La Joie d'Elizabeth" and "Le Rêve d'Elizabeth."

THE Crispbread that came to this country "first cabin"

LONG before these delicious wheat biscuits were sold in America, cherished packets of Peek Frean's Crispbread came over from England in the trunks of returning travelers.

To-day, in thousands of homes in America, AllWheat Crispbread is a daily accompaniment to every meal . . . served plain or blending its wheaty flavor with butter, jams, cheese or honey.

"...BUT THE CLEAR BEAUTY OF THE ENGLISH OUTSHINES THEM ALL"

"All the lovely women of the world seem to be gathered here on the Lido ... languorous, dark Castilian beauties, and Viennese, with their vivacious charm ... American women, superbly poised and sure. But I know you would agree that the clear beauty of the English outshines them all. ... Complexions as fair as a May morning, as radiant as this southern sun."

—From the letters of an Englishman abroad.

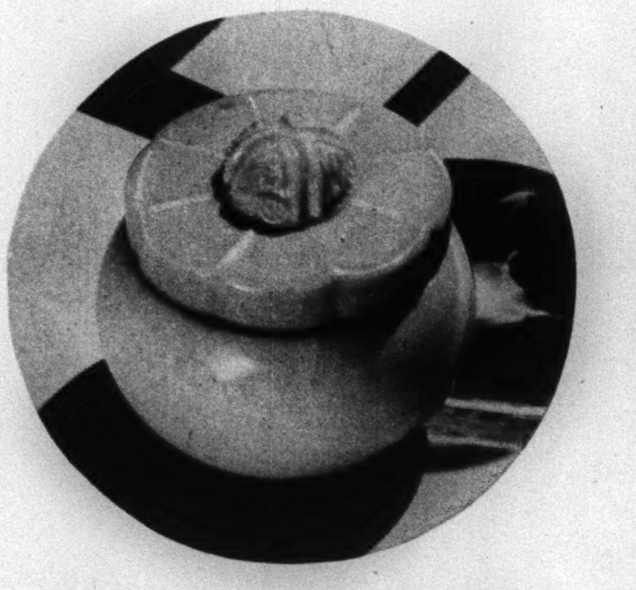
This Soap, This Cream, This Powder Preserve that Radiant English Beauty

PERHAPS you have envied the clear, fresh beauty of the English woman's flawless skin. Perhaps you have wondered that she could preserve this radiance long past her early youth.

But she has no complexion secrets. She uses one soap, Yardley's English Lavender, mild and fragrant as the English morning. One cream, Yardley's English Complexion Cream, to cleanse and nourish and protect. And one powder, Yardley's again, so finely blended that it only heightens the natural glow of her coloring.

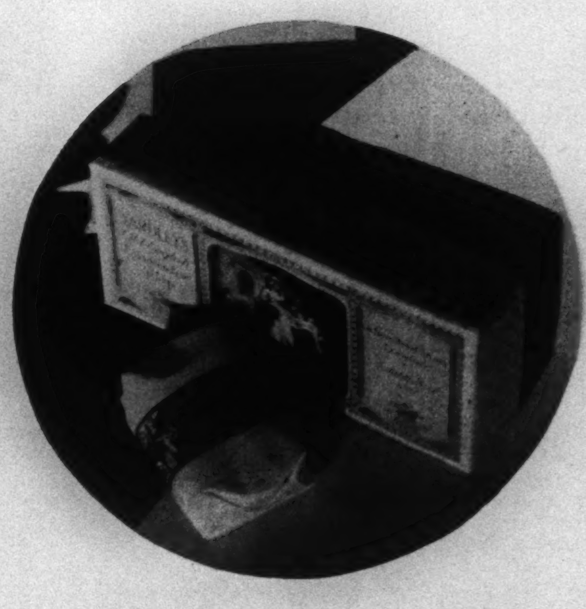
These three Yardley products make up her beauty treatment. Yardley's soap is for her bath and for the initial cleansing of her face. English Complexion Cream completes the cleansing, sinking deep into the pores to loosen every defiant particle of dust. This versatile cream is also her nourishing cream at night and her powder foundation in the morning. Most remarkable of all, it can be washed away in clear, cold water! The slight invisible film it leaves becomes the perfect base for Yardley's English Lavender Powder, a lovely, caressing powder made in four subtle tints, to blend with every skin.

Since 1770, Yardley toiletries have contributed to the loveliness of English gentlewomen. Today they are waiting for you. Yardley & Co., Ltd., 8 New Bond Street, London; 452 Fifth Avenue at Fortieth Street, New York City (wholesale only). Also Toronto and Paris.



Yardley's English Complexion Cream, to cleanse, nourish and protect your skin. It is also used as a powder foundation, and can be washed away with water. In an exquisitely designed jar, $1.50.

Yardley's English Lavender Face Powder in four skilfully blended shades to accentuate the charm of your own coloring. The price is $1.



Yardley's English Lavender Soap for bath and complexion. Bland, cooling, cleansing, refreshing. Box of 3 cakes, $1, or 35c a cake. Guest size, 20c a cake. Bath size, 50c a cake.

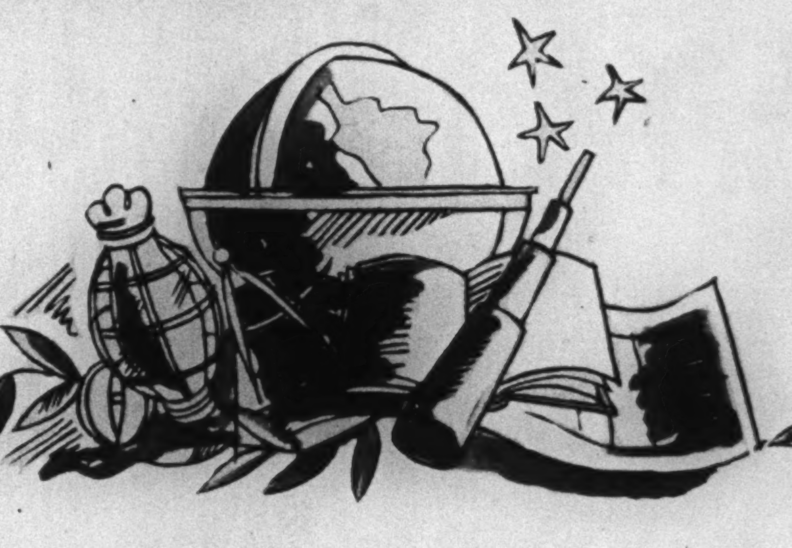
To the Man who has always wanted a Boat ...but thought he Couldn't Afford it

Oh I am tired of brick and stone, the heart of me is sick
For windy, green, unquiet sea — the realm of Moby Dick;
And I'll be going, going, from the roaring of the wheels,
For a wind is in the heart of me, a fire is in my heels.
— JOHN MASEFIELD.

(Courtesy of The MacMillan Co., owners of copyright)



TO YOU who have heard the call of the sea . . . the beck of foam-shot blue swells, weaving in the sun . . . of salt spray flying, of sea wind strong upon your cheek; to you who have longed to be master and mate of a craft of your own . . . to drive a creaming wedge through trackless waters:

Elco has made it easy for you to own a boat!

In the Elco Fleet are models that cost no more than a good motor-car. You can select a boat to suit your taste and purse at Port Elco, in the heart of Manhattan, as easily as you would order an automobile — or a suit of clothes.

Your Elco will be delivered at any time, at any place — fully equipped, ready to put to sea, or to cruise the thousands of miles of inland waterways. Gone will be the crowded, fume-choked highways. Gone, the dusty railroads; the restless, expensive summer hotels. You will be lord of a world of your own — a world of peace, content and quiet; the world of spacious water.

You can leave the office Friday afternoon, pick up the family and the boat at, say, New Rochelle, and anchor off Stamford for the night. After breakfast, cooked and served aboard, you can cruise down the Sound to New London, sail over to Port Jefferson, a wonderfully peaceful harbor on the north shore of Long Island, and sleep on board there in roomy, comfortable berths. Cruising homeward along the north shore, you are back at your desk on Monday . . . relaxed, refreshed — a new man!

When cold weather sets in, your Elco will be lifted from the water for you and safely stored for the winter at very moderate cost, either at the nearby Elco marine basin at Bayonne, N. J., or, if more convenient, at any one of a dozen good shipyards which render the same service under Elco supervision. No bother. Elco service also includes competent operating instruction. If you can drive a car, you can run an Elco — and traffic conditions are much better on water than on land!

A small down-payment gives you the Key to Freedom immediately. Since 1892, Elco has been making these wonderful, seaworthy, trustworthy boats. There are no finer craft afloat. Drop in at Port Elco, 247 Park Avenue (at 46th Street), where you can board and inspect to your heart's content any or all of the six Elco Cruisers. In the meantime, write for full particulars, or telephone Wickersham 6573 and a representative will call.

You can own a new Elco for as little as $3475, paying $1430 DOWN (including insurance). Spread the balance over a period of twelve months at as low as $193 monthly. In the meantime, you have the use of the boat . . . for health, pleasure, and restoration of city-jangled nerves.

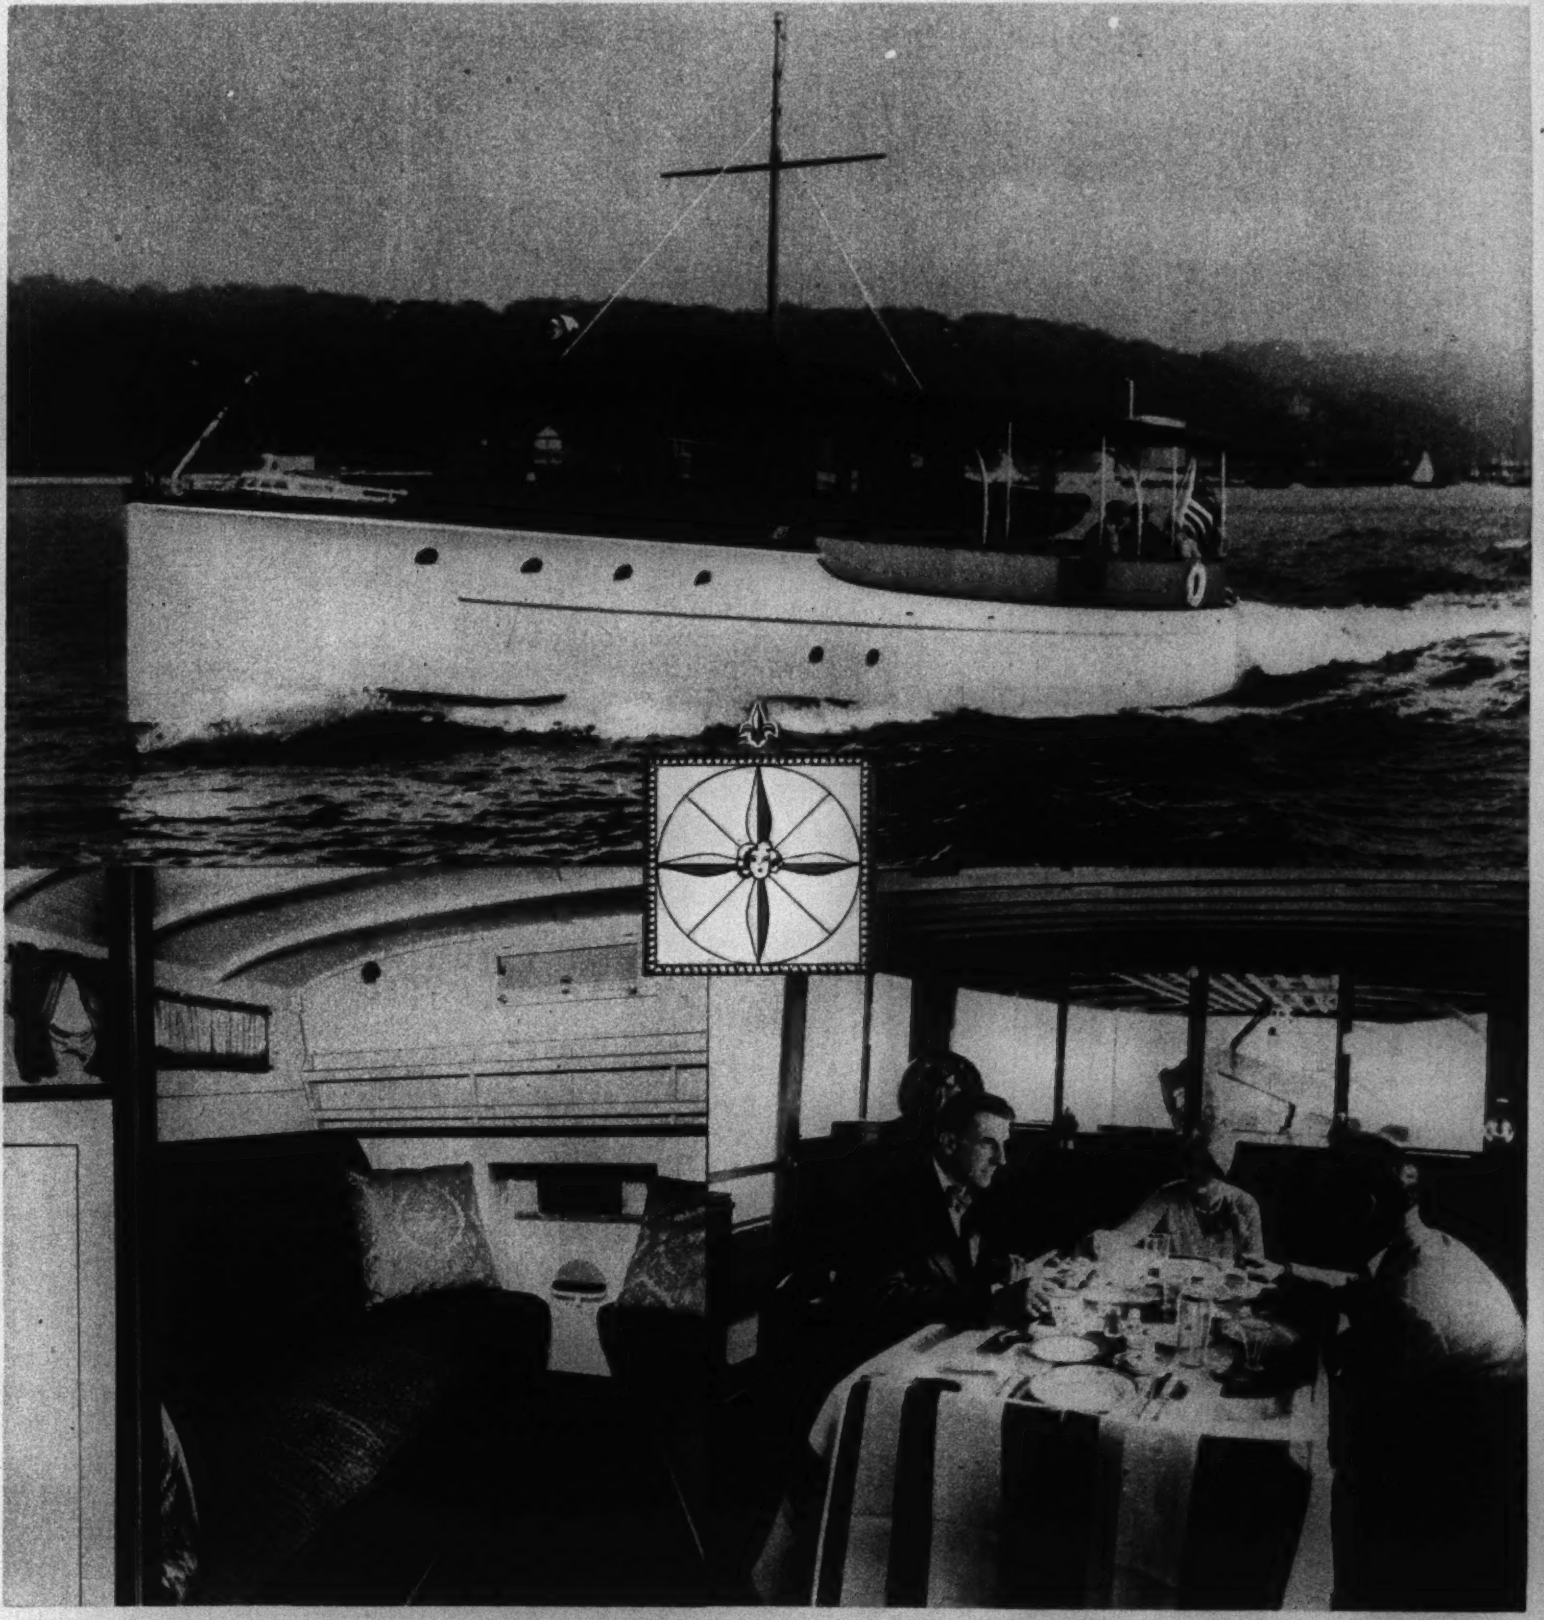
Pride of the Elco Fleet, the 50-foot Motor Yacht. A twin-screw cruiser with deckhouse and every convenience for party of six and crew of two. Roomy and comfortable lobby with bookshelves, cabinets and reading lights. Two luxurious staterooms, completely furnished. Bathroom has shower-bath, toilet, wash-basin, shelves, mirror, linen-closet and medicine-locker. A veritable floating palace that costs much less than you would expect.



Cabin of 35-foot Elco Cruisette, looking forward. Note deep, soft transom seats, full bed-length, which when made up at night form lower berths. The backs hinge upward to form upper berths. Folding table fits between transom seats for meals or cards in cabin. In the true sense of the word — A Home Afloat.

Deckhouse of 50-foot Elco Motor Yacht, looking aft. A place where six full-sized persons may sit at table and satisfy that deep hunger of sea-going appetites. With music by America's best dance-bands and symphony orchestras to add a sparkling zest. An ocean-liner in miniature — for you and your friends.

The Steinway, heart of the cultured home, is easily purchased by the modest income

A PHOTOGRAPHIC STUDY OF SERGEI PROKOFIEFF. He says of the Steinway: "I have always found the Steinway piano a perfect instrument, combining remarkable brilliancy of tone in forte, with exquisite delicacy of tone in piano, and both based on a perfect action."

THE HANDS OF SERGEI PROKOFIEFF. These are the curiously attractive hands of an ultra-modern genius. Schooled at the Petrograd Conservatory, winner of the Rubinstein prize, these hands have caught the sophisticated attention of the musical world by their interpretations of difficult music. They also created on the Steinway two arresting compositions, "The Love for the Three Oranges," and "The Flaming Angel," about which the colorful echoes of a musical controversy still eddy.

THE piano of every great pianist since Wagner! The instrument upon which Paderewski, Rachmaninoff and Prokofieff built their brilliant careers! This very instrument easily may be in your home tomorrow, completing the decorative scheme of your most beautiful room . . . linking your home with its glamorous traditions, providing your friends with distinguished entertainment. . . . And this can be achieved with as little strain on your income, modest though it may be, as was entailed in the acquirement of any other fine thing in your possession.

Your Steinway may be selected from a variety of carefully designed and finished models inspired by the historic periods of art and decoration. Each of these period models is worthy of the most discriminating owner, each is a masterpiece in graceful proportion and exquisite line.

So spectacular has been the history of the Steinway, so impressive the prestige of those artists for which it has faithfully and thrillingly interpreted the dreams of genius, that many have taken for granted that the Steinway is beyond the reach of the limited income. But such is not the case. The Steinway is within easy reach of almost everybody.

For a sum as low as 10% of its price, the Instrument of the Immortals can be in your home tomorrow. The payment of the remainder may be distributed conveniently over a two-year period. Thus, as easily as you obtained your automobile, your electric refrigerator, or your furnace, you may obtain the Instrument of the Immortals . . . a beautiful, life-long possession that not only is a cultural inspiration but a distinctive adaptable decoration.

A new Steinway Upright piano can be bought for a total of $875

GRANDS $1475 and up

10% down balance in two years

Any Steinway piano may be purchased with a cash deposit of 10% and the balance will be extended over a period of two years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange.

THE STEINWAY BABY GRAND. A Steinway of this size and power . . . at $1475 . . . is an extraordinary value. It is the ideal instfument for the majority of homes. Its beautiful finish harmonizes with any plan of interior decoration that may be chosen, and its size is such as to conserve floor space and still retain that beauty and breadth of tone that a true grand piano ought to have.

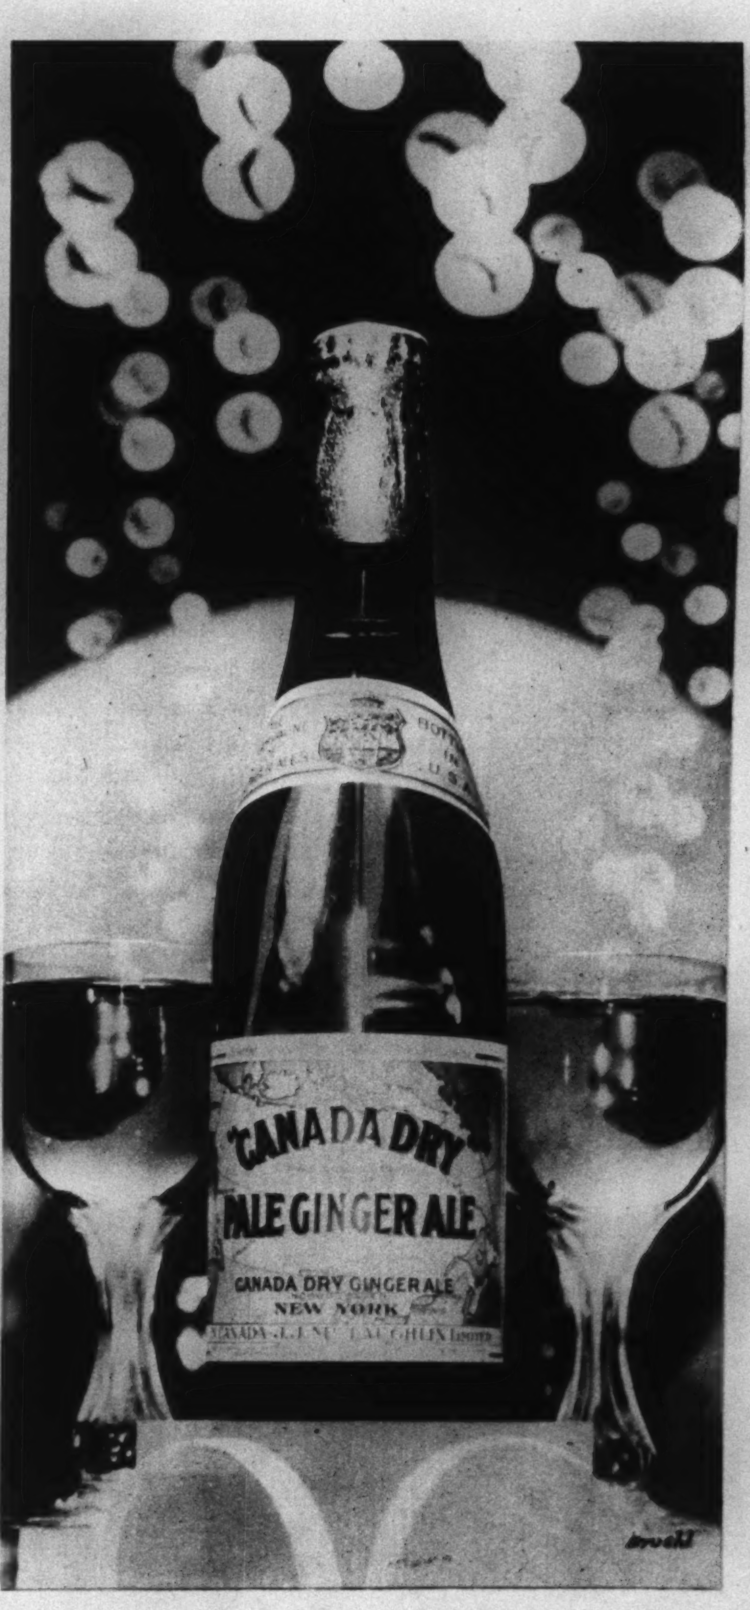
Adventure in the Northland

Among the Sno-Birds at Lake Placid Club, rendezvous of winter sportsmen, "Canada Dry" adds distinction to any occasion.



DOWN THE TRESTLE THEY GO . . . wind in their faces . . . lean bodies poised . . . vigor and health in every motion . . . seeking adventure . . . courageous sportsmen. While matching in exhilaration, suggesting the thoroughbred quality of sport itself, actually stimulating them to greater bodily activity is "Canada Dry" Ginger Ale, the beverage they drink before and after exercise.

Here is a marvelous beverage . . . keen as the smell of pine trees through the snow . . . healthful as a winter wind . . . pure as white snow itself . . . thrilling as a glorious ski-jump from the lip to the snowy softness of the slope.

The vigor of sportsmen is the vigor and health of "Canada Dry"

Sportsmen the world over immediately sense the vigor and health of this fine old ginger ale. It gives pleasure, yes. Its flavor is marvelous too. But consider this: "Canada Dry" has won the approving nod of connoisseurs . . . wherever sportsmen gather, there you will find the Champagne of Ginger Ales. The vigor and drive which make sportsmen is the sort of vigor you get when you drink this fine old ginger ale. Truly, it is a wonderful beverage.

Basic excellence gives "Canada Dry" its stimulating bodily effect. Its very foundation is "Liquid Ginger"—which we make from selected Jamaica ginger root by a special process. This process is exclusively controlled by us and, unlike any other method, retains for "Canada Dry" all of the original aroma, flavor and natural essence of the ginger root. Rigid laboratory control assures uniformity, purity and highest quality. A special process of carbonation enables "Canada Dry" to retain its delicate sparkle.

For a nation of sportsmen here is the beverage of zest and keenness

And as a result the marvelous flavor of "Canada Dry" is winning countless friends . . . it is served in the Houses of Parliament at Ottawa . . . in great hotels from London to San Francisco . . . at famous resorts . . . on transatlantic liners . . . for the heritage of sport is excellence . . . and that is the heritage of "Canada Dry"—the drink of sportsmen.

Drink "Canada Dry"! Order it when you dine out. Serve it with your meals. For to this nation of sportsmen comes the sportsmen's drink to grace the occasion. Order this fine old ginger ale in the Hostess Package of 12 bottles.

INTESTINAL TOXICITY

AND RISK SUFFERING SICK FATIGUE, HEADACHES AND BAD BREATH

TRAIN headaches, seasickness and indigestion are often the results of the changes in food, drinking water and established habits that of necessity accompany traveling. The business trip, under such circumstances, becomes a piece of unsuccessful drudgery; the pleasure trip merely a miserable incident. But it really is not necessary to let intestinal toxicity in this manner harm either your business or your pleasure. There is no need to permit poisons arising from a neglected eliminative system to endanger your health.

It is a simple matter to combat intestinal toxicity. Thousands are doing it by natural means. A balanced diet, fresh air, plenty of good, pure water and exercise. In addition, especially while traveling, a certain degree of assistance usually is necessary. And that assistance should be the gentle, thorough action of ENO. When you pack, put a bottle of this pleasant laxative in your grip. You can buy it at any drug store or soda fountain. But it is just as well to be prepared by taking a bottle along with you.

ENO never leaves you "all dragged out." It simply flushes and cleanses the intestinal tract and speeds up normal action. It does not gripe or disturb the day's routine. And its valuable anti-acid qualities are helpful in some cases of acidosis.

This famous, pleasant-tasting, effervescent salt is available at all druggists at 75c and $1.25 a bottle. Prepared only by J. C. Eno, Ltd., London, England; Buffalo, N. Y.; Toronto, Canada; Paris; Berlin and Madrid. Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., Belmont Bldg., Madison Ave. at 34th Street, New York City.

"Just pour it in and drink—it stirs itself!"

ENO—health aid—will cost you less than 3c a day

When you get up, take a generous teaspoonful of ENO in a glass of water. This sparkling saline, taken regularly, helps keep you fit and eager through the hardest day. For a business headache, take a glass of ENO. At soda fountains everywhere.

A Boston Beauty and a Southern Belle

Mrs. John Davis Lodge

Miss Virginia Carter Randolph

"I believe in beauty!" says Mrs. John Davis Lodge. "Women should live for loveliness, for lovely minds in lovely graceful bodies." Bride of the grandson of the famous United States Senator Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, young Mrs. Lodge was born Francesca Braggiotti, and grew up in Florence, Italy. She is beautiful, with starry wide dark eyes, hair golden as Mélisande's, and flawless skin as delicately tinted and fine of texture as a tea-rose. (Right) Mrs. Lodge is widely known as a dancer, and her brilliant interpretation of Schéhérézade is much admired.

Miss Virginia Carter Randolph of Warrenton, Virginia, is of the historic Randolphs who came from England in the 17th Century. The modern version of the traditional Southern belle, her life is one gay whirl of parties, dances, proms, and picnics. She is adorably pretty, with laughing blue eyes, gold-brown hair and fair skin exquisitely cared for. (Right) Miss Randolph adores horses and "Ginger" is her pampered favorite.

"A southern girl's duty to mankind is to make herself charming." So says Miss Virginia Carter Randolph of the Randolphs of Virginia.

"Women should live for loveliness," rejoins Mrs. John Davis Lodge of the Lodges of Massachusetts and New York. "The charm of lovely skin is important."

Both these young aristocrats are known for their beautiful skin, always flower-fresh and satin-smooth. And no wonder, for they give it the same sure care!

"I've used Pond's all my life," says Mrs. Lodge. "Thanks to their preparations, the beauty of a clear, fresh complexion lies within reach."

"I've used the Two Creams ever since I was a little girl," Miss Randolph declares. "A Southern girl must have a lovely skin, so she thinks of Pond's as her best friend.

"That lovely Cold Cream keeps your skin so marvelously clean, and the ducky new Tissues to wipe away the cream are perfectly divine. The Freshener peps you up and makes your cheeks as pink as roses, and a little Vanishing Cream before you powder will keep you pretty as a picture all evening.

"You're so much happier," she charmingly concludes, "when you know you are looking your loveliest. And then your friends will be so eager to see you and take you out!"

Beautiful women everywhere cherish the youthful loveliness of a fair smooth skin. Many, like Mrs. Lodge and Miss Randolph, find the four steps of Pond's Method simplest and surest:

During the day—First, for immaculate cleansing, apply Pond's Cold Cream over your face and neck. Pat in lavishly with caressing upward and outward strokes, waiting to let the fine oils sink into the pores.

Second—Wipe away all cream and dirt with Pond's Cleansing Tissues, soft, absorbent, economical and so much safer than old-time towels and "rags."

Third—Dab Pond's Skin Freshener briskly over face and neck. It closes the pores, firms, invigorates the skin, leaves it without a trace of oiliness.

Last—Smooth in a delicate film of Pond's Vanishing Cream, to give your skin protection and a lovely peach-bloom finish that makes your powder cling for hours.

At bedtime thoroughly cleanse with Cold Cream and wipe away with Tissues.

MID-FEBRUARY BRINGS AN ACTIVE THEATRICAL WEEK

GALLANT GAYETY

Or Whatever It Is That Donald Ogden Stewart and Hope Williams Have in Mind In the Light Comedy Entitled 'Rebound'

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON.

SEVERAL weeks ago Robert Littell, dramatic critic of The World, called a heedless world to witness that life in the theatres might be less dull if some acrimonious dispute were going on. He is by way of having his wish. For the production of Donald Ogden Stewart's "Rebound," with Hope Williams striding manfully through the leading part, has split the theatrical microcosm into those who regard it as agreeable fooling, written slavishly in the manner of Philip Barry, and those who regard it as emotional drama with a gay smile on its lips.

Mr. Stewart is most widely known as a jester; he is author of "A Parody Outline of History," "Perfect Behavior," "Aunt Polly's Story of Mankind" and "Mr. and Mrs. Haddock Abroad," and whatever a jester says is under the suspicion of being funny. Mark Twain once declared that having acquired the reputation of a humorist he could walk on the lecture platform, utter the gravest platitudes in the world and keep an audience guffawing. Not that Mr. Stewart utters grave platitudes, or at any rate many of them. Most of his comedy he has composed in the vein of light banter between fashionable young people who have a flair for turning commonplaces into pleasant laughs. But in the last act it comes down to a discussion of perfect behavior among the married, which is generally regarded as a serious subject. What we have to discover is whether the serious discussion is merely the conventional ending for a genre play or the true token of Mr. Stewart's purpose. Now, it has long been a sentimental axiom of criticism that the professional jester is probably a tragedian at heart; that is an admirable axiom for giving significance to things that have none. Just now the danger seems to be on the other side of insisting that every jester is a preacher or a disillusioned idealist taking out his bitterness in satiric gibing. While the clown's heart aches his lips curl in a gallant smile; but it is no good insisting that every time he smiles his heart aches. Most of the time, I fancy, he smiles because it suits his temperament.

NEVERTHELESS, if you see in this light comedy by Mr. Stewart many heavy implications you are well within your rights, and certainly a better listener than those who regard it as conventionalized banter. Heywood Broun strikes out angrily at any one who assumes that "light comedy" is synonymous with froth, for to him "Rebound" is "sensitive and moving" and it stands on "the edge of tragedy." The scene in which Sarah Jaffrey and her father valiantly prattle away on trivial subjects while they know that her new husband is deserting her in name only has for Mr. Broun a "haunting nightmare quality," and the play as a whole is to him a dramatization of "internal ferment." Well, that is one way of looking at it, different from the other chiefly in a matter of degree, but resulting in a more concrete conclusion. Such an opinion about "Rebound" as a whole involves a certain amount of projection of self into the dramatic situation, and that is exactly what an audience is supposed to do. Denial of self before a work of art is either boorishness or stupidity.

This whole question of what some people see in a work of art and others do not always suggests the further question of whether or not they can see more than the work of art contains. A similar topic was discussed in this newspaper about four months ago. In a moment of professional enthusiasm Olin Downes, who on Sunday resides eight pages east of this point, remarked that Toscanini had summoned more beauty from the Manfred overture than Schumann had put into it. Whereupon an up-State logician, protesting under the Sabine signature of Sylvanus Urban, denied the possibility of this act of supererogation and declared that since Schumann had written the Manfred overture, everything that was taken out of it must necessarily be his. Shortly after this, as if out of respect for Vox Populi Urbis's warning, the stock market collapsed, and many people discovered to their astonishment that what they thought they had seen in the market was no longer there.

IN many respects the stock market is a work of art—farce, comedy or tragedy, according to your experience; certainly, it can create the most enchanting illusion. It differs from other works of art chiefly in respect to the fact that when you think you see more in it than is actually there you are likely to discover your mistake. The drama is less vindictive. In the first place, it is possible for a good actor to evoke more beauty from a play than the author put in it. Duse did that whenever she stepped on the stage. Katharine Cornell is now doing it, rather cynically to my mind, in a paper-backed thriller with the catchpenny title of "Dishonored Lady." In the second place, it is possible for a sensitive, experienced observer to see more in a play than the author put into it; and if Duse was to be envied rather than blamed for making a play greater than its author could, so must an observer be held in high esteem for performing a similar service. It is his contribution, and the observer's contribution in the theatre is of first importance. We know that the history of esthetics has been the history of superior see-ers who have been able to look more deeply and searchingly than their neighbors. If, to go to the logical extreme, they have seen more than the author intended, it is my opinion that they are merely that much better off and that they are performing a creative service quite as real as the artist's.

BUT this idle speculation has carried us a good way off the main subject of Mr. Stewart's light comedy. However, it does suggest that, in my opinion, Mr. Broun has seen more in "Rebound" than Mr. Stewart or the actors have put there, and further that, in the circumstances, Mr. Broun is entitled to his righteous fit of temper. My enjoyment of the play is largely conditioned by previous comedies about similar people, and they were written by Philip Barry and were fuller in body, more discriminating in characterization and more expert in design and movement. In short, what keeps "Rebound" from being to me an exercise in the brave side of tragedy is what has become, theatrically, the convention of this type of play; the anguish is inherent in the formula.

How moving it is depends, accordingly, upon the skill of the playwright and the actors. In this instance Mr. Stewart's skill is best in the composition of spirited dialogue that may spring from serious emotions but that always resolves them into gayety. And Miss Williams has a talent for the same thing; she speaks the dialogue with a reticence and a shy kind of drollery that charge it with intelligent amusement. As an actress, she lacks the ability to suggest internal ferment; the scenes of waiting and dumb terror she takes in exactly the same laconical vein as she takes the breakfast table banter. Although the play may be written with movement, contour and climax, she plays throughout in one tone of subdued good-fellowship; and that begins to grow monotonous before three acts are over. For the suggestion of internal ferment you must look to the tensile acting of Walter Walker as the indulgent and sympathetic father of a congenitally distraught daughter, and to Robert Williams as the tardy suitor. They know how to suggest deeper emotions than the lines state; they are creative artists—like Mr. Broun. To me "Rebound" seems to be an amusing light comedy with a polite suggestion of deeper things. When it goes off the deep end it goes beyond its natural depth, and beyond the professional depth of its chief player.

THE DANCING STONES RALLY TO A FAMILY FETE-DAY

By JOHN HUTCHENS.

YOU could try, as you wished to be detached about it, and perhaps, indeed, you succeeded, but there was no denying the very honest air of sentiment about it all. Here, at $16.50 an opening look, was Fred Stone coming back to the stage, long months after Mr. Dillingham had been disturbed one morning at reading in the public journals that his old star had fallen abruptly out of the sky; here, too, was the second Stone daughter, Paula, dancing her lissome way to a bright début, and out front was the irrepressible Master Will Rogers, he who had come to the rescue in "Three Cheers" to pinch hit for Mr. Stone. . . . You'd be hearing about it pretty soon in a curtain speech.

"Ripples" was opening and all the props were set for one of those infrequent sessions wherein mist is reported to blur the obdurate Broadway eye, as it really does sometimes when nights in the theatre are given over in all honor to the elders. On Tuesday evening it all happened according to the cherished scheme of things, and throughout the vaulted spaces of the New Amsterdam no such affectionate cheers had resounded since, perhaps, the night Mr. Gillette bounded out of retirement to be his sleuth-like self again a scant ten weeks ago in "Sherlock Holmes." But in the audience that greeted the Stones the tears gleamed right and left around you with a candor that quickened now and again into laughter at the old and reminiscent gestures. More often it subsided into a sort of wistful and reflective admiration.

The point of it was that here together—by something like a miracle—was the greatest trouping family left to the legitimate stage and still obeying the purple old tradition that those who grow up in the theatre belong to it without thought of escape; that, indeed, they grow up with the effortless, charming facility born of a lifetime in a world that is never quite workaday. As long ago as a November night in 1923, when Dorothy Stone made her début, at 17, in "Stepping Stones," you could see how it works out. In a show that happened to be built around them she simply danced with her father as she had danced for years, while in an upper box the two younger sisters, Paula and Carola, fixed excited but judicial eyes on the sister they would some day follow. They knew all her dances, songs and lines by heart. Now Paula is in the show, and Carola, who understudies her and lurks in the wings, has been promised a place in the next one. The stepping Stones are nearly a parade across a Broadway stage, which is as the head of the family long ago decided he would like to have it.

They will never, of course, know for themselves the kind of training he knew, though each of the girls started earlier in life than he did along the path that finds its way at last to the calcium-lighted glory of the Broadway musical stage. Dorothy was the first, and she managed to keep away from the stage for almost a year until her father carried her before an audience at the old Montauk Theatre in Brooklyn and there dedicated her future to the song and dance business.

Each of them, it is attested, crawled from her bassinet in what was unmistakably distinguished as the Fred Stone manner, and they early rode horses and danced on the "ranch" at Amityville. When the script of an impending Stone musical came into the house the daughters settled upon it and with astonishing precocity knew every line and cue before their parent had learned a dozen speeches. It is a chapter, too, in the Stone family annals that Dorothy—who must then have been all of three years of age—once appeared from nowhere at the end of an act of "The Red Mill" and took a bow and an unscheduled somersault amid prophetic applause.

The heart of the Stone shows is dancing, and they have all known every routine from the simplest of the steps to the most eccentric of all that footwork celebrated under the Stone name throughout a long, long career. It has been their great inheritance that the technique their father evolved through many years and shows has been theirs since the beginning. An education, for all theatrical purposes, for the watching.

In his own case, of course, it had been otherwise, ever since those days when, as the 8-year-old prodigy of the Kirby Circus, he cavorted about in tarlatan skirts and a blond wig, glorying in his wire-walker's label of "Mlle. Amy D'Arcy, the Human Doll," the pride of Wellington, Kan. Subsequent records of 1886 have him traveling with the Sells-Renfrew Circus—playing Topsy, they say, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," a play still provocative in that era of Kansas's bloody and talkative battlegrounds. What came to be recognized as the Stone ingenuity was even then functioning, however, at a relatively white heat. He was dancing on wires, bending himself around poles, astonishing the natives with an assortment of talents.

There were vaudeville tours, there were engagements in the lesser variety halls, and finally there was the day, important in the history of good, clean fun in America, when Mr. Stone and Dave Montgomery met in Galveston and joined Haverly's dimly remembered minstrels at a salary of $25 a week. While the question was still impending as to whether the salary was $25 each or for the team as a whole, the show closed and stranded them in New Orleans. Then, in no great time, they were making their début at Koster & Bial's on the Bowery, drawing always nearer to their Broadway première in Charles Frohman's "The Girl From Up There."

Not the least emotional aspect of Mr. Stone's career has been his allegiance during most of this century to the management of Charles B. Dillingham. Mr. Dillingham, in the days of "The Girl From Up There," was Mr. Frohman's general manager and he was occupied in his spare moments with ambitious but praiseworthy thoughts of becoming a producer in his own right. In 1906, after three years of waiting patiently for Montgomery and Stone to end their run in "The Wizard of Oz," he had his opportunity at last and the result was "The Red Mill." Mr. Stone was, for four years and your

RIALTO GOSSIP

Mr. Pemberton Remembers—Nell Gwynne Again—Mr. Barry's New Notion—And Mr. Behrman Writes a Play

MR. PEMBERTON has bought a play by Gladys Unger—a piece having something to do with grand opera. (Mr. Pemberton's "Enter Madame" was not unconcerned with grand opera, and who shall say that he has not been swayed by that memory?) At all events, he plans to present it next season with Leyla Georgie in the principal rôle. Miss Georgie was the first Charmaine in "What Price Glory?" . . . Speaking of Mr. Pemberton, his "Strictly Dishonorable" did not fare so well with the Chicago newspaper men, but trade is brisk at the box office.

The play hitherto known as "Miss Gulliver's Travels" is being billed out of town as "Shreds and Patches," doubtless with a bow to "The Mikado." There is still another name in the offing, however, for when it comes to town it will be "The Curtain Rises." That will be along about March 10. . . . The authors of "The Curtain Rises," whose identity has been a bit vague to date, are now revealed as George Ford and Ethel Taylor, the former being a play producer and the latter—if one is not mistaken—an actress. Mr. Ford also has up his sleeve an operetta on Nell Gwynne, who once got as far as an announcement with Mr. Ziegfeld. This particular libretto, which is the work of Henry Myers, is modern save for prologue and epilogue. It will open out of town, Mr. Ford hopes, about Easter time, and the title rôle will be taken by Helen Ford, who is also Mrs. George Ford.

Philip Barry's "Hotel Universe," which the Theatre Guild will presently produce, is said to be revolutionary in technique. . . Arch Selwyn will get back from Florida in another two weeks, all refreshed. He has some notion of doing another show here this season.

Mr. Behrman of "Meteor" and "The Second Man" has written another one called "Love Story," as yet not in the hands of a producer. Mr. Behrman himself, meanwhile, is picture-writing on the Coast.

The Theatre Guild, among its various prospects, has a play by Paul Green called "The House of Connolly," and somebody else has a Paul Green play called "Tread the Green Grass." And so a story sprang up that the Guild preferred the second of these, and that it had been hinting at a trade. So the tale got itself printed in this column, and now it turns out to have been correct in all save one salient particular—it seems that the Guild did not hint at an exchange. . . . But there are two plays by Paul Green.

Mr. Belasco, in response to inquiries, says that he is rewriting—personally, this time—the play called "Blind Window," which he tried out earlier in the season. He will have it ready to test again in the Spring. Beth Merrill, who has not had much luck lately, will again have the chief rôle.

Jed Harris has taken over the Morosco Theatre for the year beginning in September, and probably that means that there will not be a Harris production in town until that time. He is working at present on "Mister Gilhooley," and will probably try it out this Spring. In addition to Arthur Sinclair, those mentioned informally for the cast include Ralph Cullinan and Walter Connolly. . . . Mr. Harris's plans are notoriously subject to change, and the foregoing must be read in that light.

Miss Brady's impending play, which has had a number of titles, is now called "Love, Honor and Betray"—with a splendid chance that it will be something still different before it comes to New York. It will arrive at the Eltinge on or about March 10.

"Recapture" will keep going at the Eltinge until Tuesday, thus insuring for Mr. Woods his portion of the motion picture money. A New York run of three weeks is required before the producer may start dickering with the film magnates.

Parts of "The Little Show" were looked at askance by the Boston censor. The Carthaginian sketch was elided and the "Moanin' Low" number was tampered with a trifle.

It was all a mistake about Mr. Cohan—he is not going to write for the talking pictures. He will be back here presently. . . . The report that Mary Hay is the author of the farce called "She's No Lady" turns out, strangely enough, to have been correct. The show, with Lynne Overman in it, is now on tour in the mid-West.

It is not all fun, this business of putting on the big musical shows. Mr. White's "Flying High" is said to require new scenery. Mr. Urban, hurriedly commissioned, will turn out the settings in time for Newark to see them two weeks from tomorrow, and a week later the show will come to Mr. White's Apollo Theatre.

Miss Fields and Mr. McHugh, who turned out the lyrics and the tunes for "The International Revue," are out on the Coast at present, despite the fact that their show has been passing through sundry changes en route to New York. . . . Mr. Gribble's "Elizabeth and Essex" will open next Friday night in Wilmington, which will probably be considerably puzzled.

"Josef Suss," when it goes on tour in another week, will travel as "Power"—which seems to be a wise move, in view of the merits of the book. . . . And, believe it or not, Frank McGlynn will act in a talking picture version of "Good News."

That Viennese operetta called "The Duchess of Chicago," which the Shuberts tested some months ago, will probably be launched again ere long. Mentioned for the principal rôles are Oscar Shaw and Dorothy Dickson, Miss Dickson being the girl who used to dance with Carl Hyson many years ago, and who subsequently became an actress of reputation in London. She came here some weeks ago on a visit—the story at the time was that she would not be doing any play-acting.

The Theatre Assembly, which could rest on its laurels with the successful "Everything's Jake," finds itself committed to 1,200 subscribers for two new productions. (You might think they could get around this by putting on one new production for 2,400 subscribers, but such is not the case.) One of the two, they say, will be an intimate musical comedy—intimate if they do it at the Princess, anyhow.

Richard Bennett's play will have a Russian choir in it, of all things. The name of it, it may be remembered, is "Siberia," and it will first be seen in Newark the week of March 3. There will follow Brooklyn and Philadelphia, which will make it pretty late for this season so far as Broadway is concerned.

The Gallo Theatre again enters the scheme of things. Mr. Herndon of the Belmont is about to take it over and presently one will again be traveling to Fifty-fourth Street.

Mr. Friedlander has a musical piece called "Jonica," which begins in a convent and goes on to places where musical comedy flourishes more naturally. It is being touched up a bit by Moss Hart, whose "Once in a Lifetime" is now awaiting production by Sam H. Harris.

A fraction of the Lambs' membership, together with a solitary actress, is about to try its luck with a coöperative production. The play in the case is a piece called "What a Break!" and the author is named John Ravold.

At this moment only a single new production is definite for the week beyond this—Mr. Shaw's "The Apple Cart," due a week from tomorrow at the Martin Beck. There is a good chance that "Tread the Green Grass" will open at the Belmont that week, and Mr. Hodge is also a possibility with "The Old Rascal." There are hints, too, of a farce called "What a Question!" and the James Rennie play "Gala Night." . . . The season, plainly, is about over.

George Abbott, Who Used to Be an Actor, and a Good One. He Has Returned to That Role on Behalf of the Incoming "Those We Love," of Which Play He Is Co-Author.

NEWS OF THE DRAMA IN VARIOUS PARTS OF THE WORLD

"POINT COUNTER POINT"

London Sees a Less Than Successful Dramatization of Huxley's Baffling Novel

LONDON, JAN. 31.

ALDOUS HUXLEY'S novel, "Point Counter Point," has appeared at Daly's Theatre in a dramatization called "This Way to Paradise," by Campbell Dixon. A few days before the production there appeared in a London newspaper an interview with Mr. Huxley in which he seemed to express approval of this version of his work, and I said to myself: "Well, if Huxley is pleased, a task that has all the appearance of impossibility must have been accomplished," and I went to the play in eager expectation.

The extreme difficulty of Mr. Dixon's undertaking is apparent to any one who is familiar with the novel. "Point Counter Point" is very long and very complex. It is less a telling of a story or even of a related group of stories than the expression of a mind in a series of scattered fragments. To many readers of high intelligence the book is almost incomprehensible. I have heard people whose judgment I respect complain that the characters in it are all shadows, that you recognize them for a moment and then lose them, that their comings and goings, their chatter and extravagance, leave you in a mist from which no significance emerges. This opinion, though it is not my own, I repeat because it throws light on Mr. Dixon's difficulties. Upon me, the novel left an impression of unity. I had to struggle for it. The reading was not easy, and I found that if I put the book aside for twenty-four hours I had to start at the beginning again. And in my memory today the characters are but names and the recollection of their activities is extremely misty. But I did receive from the book an impression of a mind, a philosophy of life, illumined, not by a steady glow of accumulating significance, but by innumerable diverse flashes of comment, imagination and insight. The characters were of little account; the plot was confusing and sometimes over-abrupt; but the book, considered as a whole, had an extraordinary spiritual quality which made it a mirror of its author.

These being the merits and the demerits of Mr. Huxley's original work, how was it to be interpreted on the stage? I do not think it can be done. He has invented a form of expression proper to himself; it has no counterpart within the limits of the theatre. At any rate, to produce in the theatre anything resembling the effect of "Point Counter Point" would, I think, call for a kind of free impressionism, a complete abandonment of naturalistic ties. Instead, Campbell Dixon has remained faithful to a few fragments of the book. So far as each fragment goes, the transference from page to stage is reasonably competent, but the whole play produces the effect which might be produced upon a reader who skimmed the book in quest of epigrams and melodrama. He would find epigrams—good ones; he would find melodrama, much less good; but he would not have a notion who all the people were or what they were driving at.

This is the fate of the playgoer. People appear on the stage for a few minutes, chatter and disappear. An old man makes love to his secretary who, in the last act, reports that she is about to have a baby. The old man's son, a novelist named Philip Quarles, is having trouble with his wife who displays a tendency to run away with Everard Webley, the leader of the British Freemen. Webley is murdered by a little man named Spandrell, who, at the time of the murder, has been revealed only as an experimental sensualist and whose murderous desire seems, in the theatre, to have no motive at all. And then, if you please, at the end of the play, we are invited to watch Spandrell preparing to die because his vital experiments are exhausted and have proved barren and because he thinks that he has discovered the secret of life and evidence of immortality in Beethoven's A minor quartet. Now this scene, to the experienced reader of Huxley, is evidently a spark of his genius. Nothing in his work is more interesting than his interest in the contemplative life, and Spandrell is feeling his way along one of the many contemplative paths. This is plain if you know your Huxley. But if you do not, if you are an uninitiated playgoer who has come in expectation of seeing a self-contained play, the scene of Spandrell's death will be without meaning, or almost without it.

The whole play is, in fact, a warning to those who fondly imagine that any famous book can be conveniently adapted to the purposes of the stage. It is vague and scrappy and inexpressibly dull; and yet, short of some wild and fortunate impressionism, I do not see how Mr. Dixon could have done much better than he has done. Aldous Huxley is not translatable into the terms of the naturalistic theatre. His characters have not enough firmness of outline; they are too misty, too abstract, too elusive. The failure is a failure in the impossible.

By way of contrast we saw on the preceding night a revival, in the costume of its own period, of Sir Arthur Pinero's early farce, "Dandy Dick." Though it falls away a little toward the end, it is extremely good fun for a couple of acts. What chiefly impressed me in it was this: that, unlike the farces of today, it was not loosely put together and relied very little upon the invention or personality of a particular comedian. It was a piece of solid, cautious, almost academical dramatic workmanship—highly theatrical, highly conventional, full of catchwords and people whose very appearance was designed to be a cause of laughter. But it had style. Beneath the extravagance of the farce was a genuine feeling of period. In modern clothes it would have been meaningless and dull. But in its own setting it was not only a glorious absurdity but, in its unpretentious way, a historical document.

LINES FOR ACTORS' SCRAPBOOKS

THE patient interviewer, whose thankless chore it is to entice biographical material from actors, usually runs up against two kinds—those who can't give enough information about themselves and those who won't. In the second group belongs Edward Donnelly, who, by interpreting the French word "soixante" as six, orders all those whiskies in "Everything's Jake!"

It is Donnelly's contention that to catalogue the rôles he has played would be futile, because even he has ("fortunately," he says) forgotten many of them. He does admit that "because he thought he had a message about art or something" he first permitted his name to be placed on a program at the Boston Museum in 1891. The play was "Shore Acres," and a fellow named James A. Herne also was in it. Boston was a long way from Donnelly's birthplace, in Bennington, Vt., but there were snowshoes, even in those days.

Donnelly casually dismisses the next twenty-five years by stating that they were spent with Belasco, Mrs. Fiske, James K. Hackett, the Frohmans, the Shuberts, William A. Brady and George C. Tyler. Then followed two years and seventeen leading parts in South Africa. This trek was caused by an erroneous report that there was good trout fishing there. In order to get Africa out of his system the actor signed for a ten weeks' stock engagement in Pittsfield, Mass. At the end of the fifty-eighth week he became tired of it all and handed in the customary two weeks' notice.

A new organization had achieved some success on Broadway and offered Donnelly a rôle in "Ambush." Since he had tried most of the old ones, he relished the idea of a new producer and went to work for the Theatre Guild. Mr. Brady got him away from the Guild in "Up the Ladder," a play that must not be confused with another of similar sounding title.

More recently he appeared with Glenn Hunter in "Behold This Dreamer." Most of the remaining time has been spent in Vermont, where the actor has been catching up with his trout fishing. A play called "Young Alexander," which a few may recall as part of last March's ephemera, interrupted this for only a brief period. But when Don Marquis wired him that the rôle of Al the bartender was his for the asking, Donnelly took apart his fishing rod and again caught the train for New York. So far he has had no cause to regret the trip.

ANYBODY who thinks that it doesn't require much experience to play the part of a window cleaner in a Broadway show has—well, to put it mildly—not been around much. Consider, since it is near at hand, the shining example of Frank Conlan, window cleaner extraordinary in "June Moon."

Before he deemed himself sufficiently equipped to tackle the rôle of the pane polisher, Conlan had played in small repertory companies in Illinois, Iowa and Indiana; he had been, among other Shakespearean characters, Iago to the late Robert Mantell's Othello; he had been employed for two seasons in Chicago in "Bought and Paid For" and "The Fortune Hunter," and he had gained experience in and around this not uncelebrated metropolis with such didoes as "The Dummy," "The Ne'er Do Well," "The Fool," "The Back Slapper," "The Front Page" and a number of plays which have all but vanished from the memory of even the older inhabitants.

Over at the Broadhurst they would have you believe that it was to achieve the proper technique as a sponge specialist that Conlan ventured into the pre-articulate motion pictures, into the writing of vaudeville and revue sketches, and journeyed to London with such 100 per cent American products as "The Butter and Egg Man" and "Whispering Wires."

And then, when he finally was declared fit and ready to undertake the portrayal of the glass glosser, he seemed none too elated about it. He even made disparaging allusions to the part in describing it to John Daly Murphy, whom he has reason to regard as a brother.

"After all, it's only a bit," he explained.

"You're all wrong," Murphy told him. "Why, it's one of the best parts I've ever read. It's significant. It offers you a great opportunity. It's really vital."

Two months later, when a second company of "June Moon" was being prepared for Chicago, Murphy was engaged for the part he had termed "vital" and "significant." After signing his contract he was walking with Conlan when they met a friend, who congratulated Murphy on his job.

"What sort of a part is it?" asked the friend.

"Terrible," replied Murphy. "It's only a bit."

NEWS FROM A NEW ENGLAND RIALTO

BOSTON, Feb. 12.

"THE LITTLE SHOW" is settled comfortably into the Wilbur for a month to come, and next Monday "The New Moon" will take over the Shubert for two—both with something like the original casts. Easier in its mind is the big Bostonian public for musical plays. Of late too many tryouts have rather irritated it—tryouts that have been none too fit for audiences. The bedlam behind the scenes when all concerned in "The Nine Fifteen Revue" were desperately struggling to get it into shape for New York, or else give it up altogether, did not produce a good show in front. More slowly than audiences wish, George White lightens "Flying High" of unnecessary dunnage. At this report, the last thing to be thrown away were all the settings.

Much worse is the plight of the playgoer who prefers his entertainment without music. Exactly two plays of the spoken word are current, both farces—"Little Accident," downtown and flourishing, and "The Middle Watch," uptown at the end of a good run. (True blue Boston likes London stuff, especially when New York has turned it down.) The only other play in sight is "Young Sinners" (a second company) for Feb. 20 and every one knows what that is.

It goes into the Shuberts' white elephant, the Lyric, otherwise the old Keith's.

Meanwhile there are rumors and inquiries in the air. Successful managers of high-class stock companies in the Middle West are discovering the play famine in Boston and wondering whether, in another season, they could advisedly relieve it.

Their eyes are on the Repertory Theatre, which gave up plays a month ago for lack of audiences, and is now eking out an existence with "animal lectures" and third and fourth run talkies. But the repertory people say they expect to go back to plays next Fall, which may or may not come to pass. For the present you may hear all sorts of projects—in and out of the city—to give Boston more plays from a resident company. The idea is a theatre on the lines of Stuart Walker's in Cincinnati or Jessie Bonstelle's in Detroit.

Having taken, say, $200,000 out of the town in two weeks and having played to capacity at fourteen out of sixteen performances, the Chicago Opera Company is going its way to the relief of the other box offices. They do say that the huge audiences and the general excitement over the opera are fed by a plentiful dissatisfaction with what New York books into Boston playhouses. All three Erlanger theatres will shut down next week, and nothing is in prospect for them before George Cohan—"saved from the talkies"—comes in "Gambling" on March 10.

CHINA'S STAGE IDOL COMES TO BROADWAY

Mei Lan-fang, Modestly Known as the "Great King of Actors," Will Introduce Occidentals to an Exotic and Traditional Art

By HERBERT L. MATTHEWS.

MEI LAN-FANG, theatrical idol of China, is gratifying an ambition of many years' standing by his trip here for the engagement which is to start tomorrow. He used frequently to discuss the project with visitors in Peking, wondering whether Americans would appreciate his art, or whether, failing that, they would be interested in its color, pictorial beauty and exoticism.

It was not until last Summer, after nearly a quarter of a century on the Chinese stage, that he definitely made up his mind. I was at a tea in the garden of his home in Peking with a group of American journalists when he first announced his decision and asked, through his interpreter, what we thought of it.

Mei has never played to an all-Occidental audience. In fact, not since the early days of his career has he performed before observers who did not know his name and fame as well as we in America know the name and fame of John Barrymore or Douglas Fairbanks. His name in the Orient is one to conjure with. It draws packed houses and admiring throngs where he goes.

Mei Lan-fang was born to his dramatic kinship. His grandfather was also a famous actor, and his uncle, Yu-ti'en, who reared and trained him, was a fine musician, famed for his playing of the hu-ch'in, a stringed instrument. He taught Mei what he knows of music—which is a great deal. One of Mei's most important services to the Chinese drama has been the setting of many of the thousand-year-old dance movements to modern music.

The theatre is taken more seriously in China than it is in the Occident. It is a cherished tradition, a definite part of social life. A millennium ago the ancestors of the present Chinese watched the same plays that Mei gives today, with the actors observing the same conventions and wearing almost the same costumes. From childhood the Chinese is familiar with every gesture, every movement, every word of the performances he goes to.

Mei was born in 1893, which makes him 37 years old. He was an infant prodigy and at 7 a musician of surprising ability. He made his theatrical début at 12 in Peking, where he gradually attained local fame. Finally, at the head of his own company, when he was only 19 years old, he went to Shanghai, where the sensation he created started him on a triumphant career that soon made him the undisputed idol of Chinese playgoers.

In 1917 he made his first tour abroad, opening at the Imperial Theatre in Tokio and playing in other large cities of Japan. The histrionic arts of Japan and China are nearly enough alike for his work to have been appreciated at its full value and he was received with great enthusiasm.

Mei's only other foreign trip was also to Japan, in 1924, this time at the invitation of Baron Okura, the Japanese Maecenas, who is doing much to revive and preserve the arts of the East. He has, of course, played all over China, although, like American actors who remain most of the time in New York, he is most frequently to be seen in Peking, the art capital of China. His répertoire is enormous; it embraces some 400 plays, about a quarter of which are modern and either his own creation or works on which he has collaborated. He is a close student of European drama. Although he preserves all the essential features of Chinese drama, he has sought to introduce some of these European qualities to his own stage.

Mei Lan-fang, Who Will Appear Before New York Audiences For the Next Two Weeks.

In Peking he lives a modest, unassuming life, shunning publicity, seldom showing himself, except to go to and from his theatre. The house in which he lives with his wife and children is a European one, set as incongruously in its Chinese surroundings as is the old Marshal Chang Tso-lin's French château up in Mukden. The outer compounds contain his reception rooms and studios, as well as his famous rock grotto.

Mei Lan-fang has many honors, but he is proudest of the title of "Great King of Actors," bestowed upon him by a popular vote of 270,000 admirers. He also bears the exotic titles of "Grand Abbot of the Ching Chung Monastery" and "Foremost of the Pear Orchard." The former title is an imperial one—the highest honor that could be granted under the old régime. It was bestowed upon him by the former Emperor Hsuan T'ung. The monastery is now the meeting place of the Actors' Association of Peking, of which Mei is president. The second title is a designation that also implies he is the first actor in the land. The name originated during the T'ang dynasty, under the Emperor Ming Huang, a great patron of the arts. The imperial troupe of actors then called themselves "Disciples of the Pear Orchard," since the palace in which they performed was surrounded by pear trees.

What may New York audiences expect to see when Mei Lan-fang appears tomorrow?

He himself is slender, graceful and perfectly proportioned. The costumes he will wear will cover him from head to foot, leaving only his hands and face free. The hands are a joy to look at; the face a perfect oval, with rather full lips, but otherwise faultless in modeling.

He will, of course, be heavily made up. With the Chinese, that is a primary art. There are no less than twenty steps in the make-up for one particular play. Apart from the application of such cosmetics as honey, powder and rouge, the operation most interesting to the foreigner, perhaps, is the intricate arrangement of the hair and wig. First a cloth band, with long strings, is fastened about the head. Seven locks of twisted hair are arranged along the band and fastened in place by the strings. A long strand of hair is attached to either side of the face, and another covering is placed on the head. Finally, the helper (in Mei's case a man who has been in his service for twenty-five years) places the wig on, fastening it with the strands of hair.

Attendants then come before him with cases of jewels and boxes of flowers, from which the artist chooses those to be worn for the occasion. And thus, finally, he is ready to appear. It is part of the actor's art that despite the weight of the headdress and the greasiness of the cosmetics he must always look as fresh as when he first comes on the stage.

Mei has brought with him a score of his players and a half-dozen musicians. Chinese music—all Oriental music, in fact—has always been a puzzle to Occidentals. The tonal scale is wholly unfamiliar to Western ears. There are fewer notes in a scale, and they are so placed that not only chords but even single notes sound harsh to us. But there is a recognizable rhythm, and often a plaintive, wistful quality, that appeals even to the foreigner, and there is always the interest of exoticism.

The plays that are so familiar to the Chinese will be a mystery to us, except in so far as their pantomime and the program are enlightening. A few venturesome theatregoers who have seen Chinese performances on the Bowery will have some idea of what to expect, although the Chinese stage of New York is not a good introduction to the best that Chinese art represents.

The first thing to be noted is that men play the part of women. The Orient, for the most part, still retains the convention we discarded only a few centuries ago, which prohibits women on the stage. It is a custom which is beginning to be more honored in the breach than in the observance, but even when women do act on the stage—and such occasions are comparatively rare—they imitate the men who act as female impersonators.

In many other ways American audiences are naturally not trained to appreciate the conventions of Chinese drama. Every movement of the actor is executed according to irrevocable convention, at a well-defined rhythm and tempo. Every move of Mei's finger, every glance of his eyes, every attitude of his body, presupposes a vast amount of study and must be executed according to the most rigid conventions of histrionic art.

When Mei, in accordance with the action of his play, has to pass through a door he will be standing in the centre of a rather bare stage and he will carefully lift one foot and set it down. To every Chinese that will signify that he has entered another room or a house. The knowing critic will watch carefully just how far Mei raises his foot, how his toes are pointed, his knee bent, the swaying of his body, the lilt of his head, the precise tempo of the movement. They are all of importance.

There are many such gestures, full of meaning to the initiated, but utterly meaningless to the uninformed. For instance, Mei will raise his hand in a certain way to show that he is leaning against a wall for support. He will bow his head gently, raising his hands slightly, palms upward, to signify that he is weeping.

A Chinese critic will watch keenly Mei's use of the sleeves, the angle of his neck, his fingers, his famous hands, his gait, his eyes, his dancing. If, in the course of his play, he should have to slip in the mud, for instance (and who is there in China who doesn't slip in the mud?), it must be done in such a manner as to combine both grace and a touch of realism.

In short, it is an exceedingly intricate theatrical art which Mei Lan-fang will demonstrate to his American audiences—an art with two milleniums of tradition, far more exacting than ours and far more dependent upon convention. But at least in him New Yorkers may be certain of seeing the actor who is considered the greatest exponent of that art in the Orient.

A TROUPE OF STONES ARRIVES IN TOWN

entertainment, Con Kidder in that piece, and there were whispers of a new American institution.

It is legend now that the distinguishing mark of the firm of Montgomery and Stone was that its every new show had a deal of special "business," generally acrobatic, whereby audiences were induced to gentle terror at the prospects of a thrilling stage disaster. Thus, for "The Old Town," Mr. Stone revived his penchant for going on long, intricate strolls on a wire, at the same time that he was concerned in a serious way with roping, under the tutelage of the not-then-so-celebrated Will Rogers. The roping appeared in finished style in the next musical, and then it was evident that Mr. Stone had a definite, workmanlike procedure: during the run of one show he built toward the coming ones and, when they arrived, was ready for them with some perfected specialty or other. . . . A festive house was the Globe in those seasons, a Stone workshop wherein the star took his life in his hands (the advertisements said as much), leaving the audience to decide for itself about how to keep the heart out of the throat.

Almost certainly it was in some memory of all this that the applause was very hearty, very warming on Tuesday night when he came out to do the single turn on crutches in the second act of "Ripples." Seeing that specialty, you could guess its story and know how it grew. The same response welled up recurrently at every other indication through the show that he was really dancing again, that he could and would dance with an old, unerring skill. Backstage at the New Amsterdam, on Monday afternoon, with a first-night fever already creeping pervasively through the house, he talked quietly of the entire sequence of late events, and he had no regrets but one. He had really come to like aviation, and now he has promised to give it up, and he wishes that he didn't have to. Five more feet of clearance and he would have pulled that ship out of its nose dive. . . . He likes to talk of a great day when he flew over Kansas until he reached the town of Wellington, the town he had left in 1884 as a small boy with a red flannel uniform and a fine notion of being an acrobat. He went back to it with a flourish two years ago, landed on the golf course, sang and danced for a whole afternoon in the opera house, and then flew away again.

That pledge, however, remains. It is very definite. For there is Carola still to have her première. . . . He said something about wanting to be around at least long enough to cast the last Stone, and to leave none of them unturned toward fame.

And Now, by Way of Philadelphia and Newark, Comes the Long Heralded "International Revue," Which Is Due at the Majestic on Thursday Night. Among Those Who People It Are Anton Dolin, Jack Pearl, Gertrude Lawrence and Florence Moore.

DRAMA BY THE SEINE

M. Dullin, a Discerning Manager, Lavishes His Attentions Upon a Nightmarish Play

PARIS, Jan. 29.

CHARLES DULLIN has published in the newspapers a defiant advertisement to say that he produced "Patchouli" because he believed in the play. The sentiment does him honor, although it was perhaps hardly necessary to proclaim it—at least, to those who follow the development of the theatre in Paris. It has long been evident that Dullin is one of a half dozen or so theatrical managers who produce plays only because they believe in their artistic merits. As it is the existence of these managers which gives vitality to the French theatre, it would be wrong to discourage any one of them.

Sincere as their artistic enthusiasm and sound as their critical judgment may be, it is possible that one of them may sometimes make a mistake. Of course, he may be right, even against the unanimity of the critics and the public. At the same time he may be wrong, as I think in this instance Dullin is.

Armand Salacrou has already written two other plays, which showed promise. This one shows promise also, and until the end of the first act, which is much the best of the three, it almost looks as if it is to represent achievement. The young man whose nickname furnishes the title is a student of history, who has traced, in the minutest detail, the life of a courtezan of the Second Empire. It is indeed a little difficult to understand why the career of this relatively trivial personage should be followed so closely—even to the point of drawing upon various sources for the reconstitution of a diary. The young hero is so obsessed with his subject that the woman becomes the personification of love itself, the love which all men vainly seek, for which they are prepared to kill themselves, to ruin themselves, to surrender themselves. He has a rude awakening; for the lady herself, who is still alive, comes to see him, to bring him certain letters, and he finds that she is flippant and futile, and either has no memory at all of the men who loved her, or merely remembers them as nonentities.

Up to this point the play is good, but thenceforward it becomes lost in a maze of incoherently romantic incident and an equally confused psychology of disillusion, bitterness and despair. Love is indeed a mournful, a hopeless and a devouring passion, as presented by M. Salacrou. After his interview with the old lady, Patchouli begins by dismissing his young mistress, who is devoted to him. His own mother falls in with his mood, for she has just discovered that her husband, after thirty years of happily married life, is unfaithful to her. Thus ends the first act.

The second takes place in a low quayside café and the third in a cinema studio. The characters come together in both places in circumstances which one would expect to find only in the most lurid melodrama or serial story. In the café our young historian first incites a love-lorn girl to suicide—for no reason but that it is his mood. Then he has a fight with the husband of his former mistress. Then his father, conveniently falling in with his mood, as his mother had done in the first act, invades the place with a crowd of noisy and obviously immoral women, and illustrates the obsession of love turning to debauchery. The mother comes to find her son, and the whole family thus meet in appropriately romantic circumstances.

In the cinema studio the mother and the son have both become supers, while the star is the mistress of the first act. The son, hoping to end his life, suddenly undertakes to enter a cage of lions—who are heard, but not seen. He is not eaten, but he does not seem to be any the happier for that, nor for the flattering financial offers which the management of the studio makes to him after his exploit.

I have related these incidents because it is interesting to see how a manager of the experience and artistic capacity of Dullin can be taken in by such a nightmare, and can lavish upon it his talent as producer.

A curious experiment of another kind is a comedy called "Sport," by Madeline and Jacques de Zogheb, which has been produced for three special matinees. This couple has already given to the theatre two other plays, each of considerable interest. They now present us with a very intimate study of the sexual instinct, considered exclusively on its physical, or rather physiological, side. There are only three characters in the play, a husband, a wife and a lover—the last of whom, when we first see him, is not yet the lover, but a doctor, whom the wife has come to consult.

It is by becoming her lover that the doctor supplies the cure for the nervous depression from which his patient has been suffering; but the relief of an unsatisfied temperament is not the only result of his intervention, for it leads the lady to make her own husband also her lover, which she had never really done before.

The play is, in fact, little more than a peg for a discussion which is more pathological than artistic. There is really little artistic justification for its frankness.

PHILIP CARR.

FOUND IN THE DRAMATIC MAIL BAG

Mr. Traube Speaking.

To the Dramatic Editor:

Among the many practices of racketeering is one little trick designated as the "puff sheet," a species of publication dedicated to the proposition that a successful business man will subscribe heavily to the magazine that lauds his career and prints his views on "How I Became a Success." The existence of such a publication relies, of necessity, on the establishing of new successful figures who are willing to be boomed. The metropolitan dramatic critics seem to have adopted this policy of promotion in many of their reviews on new plays, for much that is distinctly mediocre has been boosted sky-high. It is not our intention to insinuate that any of the dramatic critics are on the salary lists of the Broadway managers, but it does seem as though at least some of them are taking stock in the popular wail these many seasons that the theatre is dying and are wondering what will happen to their jobs if the catastrophe finally occurs!

To us the many columns of free publicity donated to "The Criminal Code" has been offensive to our intelligence. The rumor even has it that Mr. Flavin's play is being quietly ballyhooed for the Pulitzer Prize. Yet it is our opinion that "The Criminal Code" is a superficial play with a stale, melodramatic last act, and is poorly acted in several instances, notably in the work of the juvenile and the ingénue. It is true that the settings of the play are extraordinarily good—in fact, they transcend the art of the play; also that the direction and the performance by Arthur Byron are excellent. But many a poor play has been nicely mounted, well directed and raised by the services of a single actor without enjoying an extended run.

Another play which has secured the delighted praise of the critics is "Strictly Dishonorable," wherein nothing happens beyond the undressing of a cute little Southern girl. This piece of business is accomplished gracefully, it is true, but it is hardly the epitome of high comedy. It is possible that the gentlemen of the press feel that it is high time that a nice fellow like Brock Pemberton should be rewarded for his years of solid effort in the theatre. The notion, generous as it may be, seems misguided in the case of this play, which has no substance at all.

Again, in the case of Katharine Cornell's latest vehicle the critics seem to be reluctant to condemn. All of them hinted that the play was rather trashy, but insisted that what is to us the meretricious acting of its leading lady and star made the play worth while. Why "Dishonored Lady" should be entitled to a run of more than two weeks is another of those mysteries of the current theatre, for it undoubtedly will last out the entire season.

At the Lyceum Theatre they are turning away people who come eager to see "Berkeley Square," a play reputed to contain profound philosophic truths. We managed to get in and came away with the notion that something is wrong somewhere, for "Berkeley Square" is downright naive as far as a fundamental message is concerned.

"Death Takes a Holiday" may also be scored as a play that won the critics' fancy for being a poetic metaphysical play. To any intelligent theatre-goer it will prove to be pretty cheap stuff.

"June Moon" has taken the critics by storm as being an intimate and humorous glimpse of the song-publishing world. As a matter of fact, this comedy is nothing of the sort, and is graced mainly through the work of Harry Rosenthal, an ex-band leader converted into an actor for this play. Ring Lardner and George Kauffman [sic], its authors, are sure having a big laugh up their sleeves at the public's gullibility.

What this all leads to is uncertain. We look to the Theatre Guild for aid, but recall a dismal line of failures this season, such as "Karl and Anna," "The Game of Love and Death," and "Meteor." The last named is unfortunate, for were it not for a sadly gauche last act it might be considered one of the truly fine plays in recent years. The fledgling offshoot of the Guild, its Studio, tried valiantly with "Red Rust," but most of the writing of that play was too childish to be considered seriously.

Perhaps if Eva Le Gallienne eventually musters up an adequate acting company, or if Leo Bulgakov is able to make some genuine headway with his project, we may have something substantial to point to in the theatre. Only let us have done with this needless praise for trivia!

SHEPARD TRAUBE.

New York, Feb. 11, 1929.

Mr. Hopkins Makes a Correction.

To the Dramatic Editor:

Will you kindly say that there has been no estrangement between Philip Barry and myself?

Will you also say that from the first I have been deeply interested in Mr. Barry's new play, "Hotel Universe"? In it he traverses new territory and shows definite growth—but I believe the play needs the early support that is assured it by a Theatre Guild production. No serious work into which an author has put himself unsparingly should be exposed to the hazard of sudden Broadway closing, such as befell Sidney Howard's play, "Half Gods."

ARTHUR HOPKINS.

MRS. SELWYN LEARNS AN OLD TRUTH

RUTH SELWYN produced her first show on Tuesday night. Even before the première she had concluded that General Sherman was wrong. There are worse things than war. Producing, for example.

"The Nine Fifteen Revue" originally bore the alliterative title of "Ruthie's Racket." It hardly seems necessary to explain what a "racket" is in these days when so many of them are operating; Mrs. Selwyn's was to get authors and composers to give her sketches and tunes, thus eliminating the bother of paying royalties. It sounded like a fine idea, but it died a-borning.

The show was first thought of at a dinner given at the Park Lane by Richard Rodgers. Lorenz Hart, George Gershwin and Rube Goldberg also were listed among those present and promised to do their bit in preparing a revue whose exalted aim was to give the leisurely diner a chance to see what an opening number looked like. As the Selwyns get around a bit, Mrs. Selwyn soon met, at this or that party, such notables as Rudolf Friml, Noel Coward, John Emerson, Anita Loos, Cole Porter, Geoffrey Kerr, Arthur Hopkins, Arthur Richman and Leslie Howard. All were interested in the idea; all agreed to contribute. Ring Lardner is reported to have been approached while shaving and to have produced a sketch without missing a stroke. It is a tale you are permitted to disbelieve.

Lunch with Max Dreyfus of Harms' resulted in Mrs. Selwyn's acquisition of a Victor Herbert number, one of the composer's posthumous works. (There are, incidentally, two others, which have not been published because of sentimental reasons.)

Several telephone calls brought forth a song from Vincent Youmans, and a meeting with William Anthony McGuire produced four sketches. Other people expressed themselves as being delighted to help. Everything was, in fact, just too lovely for words.

Then, without warning, storm clouds began to gather and gather rapidly. Mrs. Selwyn's first bit of misfortune was the discovery that Harry Ruskin, whom she had paid to direct the sketches, was permanently entrenched in Hollywood. Next Dorothy McNulty, who had a run-of-the-play contract and was regarded as valuable, developed the wanderlust and trekked to the West Coast, more in search of fortune than fame.

But that was only the start. Mr. McGuire withdrew his four offerings, sending a note which said, "Sorry you couldn't see Mrs. McGuire in these skits." Mr. Stallings, among several others, forgot his promise entirely, and Paul Gerard Smith, assigned to stage the sketches, was snatched from that task by a motion picture company which had him under contract.

When "The Nine Fifteen Revue" was tried out before bewildered New Englanders, a number of interesting facts were revealed. One of them was that sketches by cartoonists were often quite funny by themselves but didn't fit into a revue. Thus three elaborate pieces of scenery stand as mute reminders of the efforts of Milt Gross, Rube Goldberg and Tom Johnstone. A Palm Beach setting was salvaged from Arthur Hopkins's contribution—an effective number, but one which somehow slowed the show—to serve as background for the second act finale. Arthur Richman's material had to be discarded because it required chorus girls to recite lines, and those in the rear of the audience were unable to hear what was being said. Songs and skits by Rodgers and Hart and others of the better known were tested and rejected in a steady process of revision.

There were, likewise, many cast changes to plague the producer. For a while frantic searches were made for a leading comedian, and Harry Richman, among others, was summoned to see the show out of town. Afterward Mrs. Selwyn sought his opinion.

"I'd close the show," he stated. "Then I'd engage Tom Patricola, Ann Pennington and Norma Terris and have the revue written around me." "Play-producing," Mrs. Selwyn will tell you, "is hell!"

Having Given an Excellent Account of Himself in Several Plays During the Past Few Seasons, Jefferson de Angelis Now Bobs Up in "Apron Strings," Opening at the Bijou Tomorrow.

THE ROBOTS AGAIN

IT was pretty well known at the time (scarcely eight years ago) that their keenest well-wishers were constrained to smile when the moguls of the Theatre Guild filled out the contractile coupon and accepted for local production the play called "R. U. R.," by the dimly heralded Karel Capek of Czechoslovakia. The initials of the title stood for "Rossum's Universal Robots," and it was Mr. Capek's pretty notion that the televox man—as he was not known locally until he got onto the R-K-O circuit—would some day arise and smite his creators. This was to be done with, it was postulated, tireless energy and an unerring right hook.

On Oct. 9, 1922, at the Garrick Theatre, Mr. Capek's mechanical man began to do just that. Young Frankenstein, they called him with a backstage familiarity, and he swept all before him while the paying public looked on and became machine-age conscious. It was quite true, of course, that more frivolous things were coevally being received with rapture further uptown; still, it was undeniable that down on Thirty-fifth Street—and later at the Frazee—they had you worried for awhile (about twenty-six weeks): the simplest person one knew might, after all, turn out to be an overcharged battery on the loose. Synthetic but accomplished helots, they—the robots—ran things to perfection, however, entitling Miss Helburn and her colleagues to declaim, with no little self-esteem, "So there!"

Tomorrow night, at the Martin Beck, Miss Helburn and some colleagues will offer a new production of "R. U. R." for a limited engagement, trusting that all and sundry may judge in a week how shrewd a prophet was Mr. Capek. Where, they ask, were television, the talking pictures and Eric Robot himself when Mr. Capek first beset himself, in his picturesque but hardly industrial retreat in Czechoslovakia, to write his fantastic play? The meek answer to this rhetorical question is that, for the most part, they were nowhere at all, though there are people who still look back at those old days and call them good.

So the Guild's presentation of the play here is, by proclamation, "simply a fitting tribute and adieu to a play that arrived ahead of its time," and as a holiday touch all the mechanical men at the Martin Beck will be on the 1930 streamline model. The robot is a fact, even a dangerous fact, as those earnest musicians admit whose union has appropriated a fancy sum to question the virtues of mechanical theme songs; to that extent "R. U. R." has been realized. Its quality of prophecy remains in the third-act climax when the robots, in a petulant moment, annihilate mankind on the ground that it is superfluous. The robots, who are obstinate fellows, insist that they are still right about this.

LAST WEEK'S SCREEN OFFERINGS

By MORDAUNT HALL.

THE talking picture version of "Dulcy," that bright play by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly, may not be as smooth or as subtle as the original, but as the adapters have had the good sense to keep close to the parent effort and the direction was entrusted to King Vidor, it makes a breezy entertainment. Edwin Justus Mayer, in selecting the dialogue for the film, which is entitled "Not So Dumb," has not been ashamed to use lines from the play wherever possible. He is to be congratulated on his work, for there are so many film writers who think that they are only doing good work when they emasculate the novel or the play to be brought to the screen.

Marion Davies, who has done so well in the comedies directed by Mr. Vidor, gives another pleasing portrayal as the chatterbox, Dulcy, the young woman who flounders in her figures of speech, garbles platitudes, broadcasts secrets and keeps Gordon Smith, her husband in the play and her fiancé in the film, on edge, wondering what this attractive blonde bungler is going to say next.

Dulcy at one time announces that it's the "early worm that gets the bird."

When admonishing her brother Bill that he must be more tolerant, she vouchsafes:

"You know that there's so much good in the best of us—and so much bad in the worst of us—well, it ill behooves the best of us"—

She, like a certain English woman of the upper ten, deserves to be known as "The Babbling Brook." Miss Davies handles Dulcy's weaknesses in an adroit fashion, and if the part does not seem as effective as it was on the stage, it should be remembered that for the screen it had to be acted under lights and without the continuity of the play. Farce comedy though this may be, it is the sort of talking picture that ought to be encouraged, and when one harks back to some of the efforts of studio workers to conjure up laughter, this is a masterpiece. And most of the thanks are still due to the authors.

Bill, who is well aware of his sister Dulcy's shortcomings and who tries to cure her of calling him "Willie," after studying the temperaments of Dulcy's week-end guests declares that it is probably going to be the first week-end party on record that ended on a Friday night. And one is prone to think that Bill is not far wrong, for besides having a man who is on a suspended sentence as a butler, Dulcy's party includes the irascible C. Roger Forbes, to whom Dulcy's prattling is anathema; Mrs. Forbes, a silly woman; Miss Forbes, a silly girl; Schuyler Van Dyck, presumed for a time to be a mad golfer, but who eventually proves to be no golfer; Vincent Leach, a scenario writer who fancies his own work to the extent that he is generous enough to go through the whole action of his pictures before they are filmed, and then Dulcy's fiancé, Gordon Smith, and her brother, Bill. It is a gathering arranged by Dulcy to help Gordon in his business discussion with Forbes, a power in the artificial jewelry world.

Mr. Forbes has his trials listening to Dulcy, and once he seeks refuge in a game of billiards with none other than that lunatic at large, Schuyler Van Dyck, whose hallucination is that he has millions and is interested to some small extent in several industrial lines, including jewelry, motion pictures and railways.

This Van Dyck is impersonated by Donald Ogden Stewart, who succeeds in creating plenty of fun. Van Dyck seems to favor Dulcy's type of mentality by looking upon her bromidic utterances as something quite original, so when she hazards that after all there's no place like home he agrees, adding that he had never heard it put quite that way before.

Mr. Stewart, as the golfing fanatic, essays shots through the bathroom window and then uses a mashie or a niblick on Dulcy's lawn. Elliott Nugent, who acted in the original play, here figures as Gordon. William Holden makes a real human being out of Forbes. Mr. Holden's work is splendid. He is the personification of restrained fury most of the time.

Franklin Pangborn lends amusement to his rôle of Vincent Leach.

"All the King's Men."

SECOND WIFE," an audible pictorial adaptation of Fulton Oursler's play "All the King's Men," is a film with enough common sense and good acting to make up for sagging lines and stereotyped action. It is a dissertation on a young woman marrying a widower whose first wife had left him with a little boy. The argument is not profound and the reason for friction is strained, but Lila Lee and Conrad Nagel do so well with the rôles allotted to them that even when the incidents are somewhat illogical the characters still evoke enough sympathy to hold one's attention.

In an early scene Florence Wendell calls upon her fiancé, Walter Fairchild, accompanied by Gilbert Gaylord. Mr. Gaylord is in love with Florence himself and soon he goes to great pains to point out the chances of her unhappiness in marrying Fairchild, who, of course, has not yet put in an appearance. His argument is helped along by a convenient painting of Fairchild's late wife. Mr. Gaylord, with a villain's oiliness, then tells Florence how tired she will get of having the furniture that had been arranged and bought by her predecessor.

Fairchild sets at rest this argument later at dinner when he consents to move into another house and buy new furniture. Eventually Florence, in spite of Mr. Gaylord's warning, becomes Mrs. Fairchild and Gaylord goes to South America. In course of time Junior, Mr. Fairchild's likable young son by his first marriage, is sent to school in Switzerland and for a while it is to be presumed Florence is quite happy as Fairchild's second wife.

Just when Florence is about to become a mother Fairchild receives a cable message setting forth that Junior is seriously ill. He insists that he must go to Europe to see the boy, and Florence then accuses her husband of thinking more of Junior than he does of her.

Gaylord pops up again and tries to prevail upon Florence to leave Fairchild, seek a divorce and become his wife. By that time Florence's baby has been born and she and her husband are hardly on speaking terms. The young woman hearkens to Gaylord's proposal and is about to leave her husband, when she mentions the fact that she must, of course, take her child with her. Mr. Gaylord may be quite sincere about his affection for Florence, but he is emphatically opposed to having the offspring by a former husband in his home, and this leads to a happy ending for the Fairchilds and perhaps to a temporary period of disappointment for Gaylord.

The son, Junior, is played by Master Freddie Burke Frederick, a charming youngster who has a gentle voice and remarkable ability for thinking about what he is saying. His scenes with Mary Carr, who impersonates a gentle and sympathetic housekeeper known as Mrs. Rhoades, are captivating

Hugh Huntley lends a certain polish to the rôle of Gaylord in spite of the fact that his actions are not always logical.

A Gallant Card Sharp.

A NICELY produced talking picture is the latest screen version of "Cameo Kirby," the romantic play of New Orleans in 1850 by Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson. In this production J. Harold Murray as Cameo Kirby has an opportunity to sing four or five songs and they are recorded most effectively.

It is a picture with a flourish of a Mardi Gras in New Orleans and a number of scenes aboard a river steamboat. The Southern accent is not stressed, but when it is heard it possesses a real charm. Norma Terris, who sang as Magnolia in Florenz Ziegfeld's stage production of "Showboat," plays the part of the Southern belle, Adele Randall, but for some strange reason she is not called upon to sing in this film. She gives a pleasing performance, one well becoming the rôle she acts.

Robert Edeson is seen as Colonel Randall, Adele's father, who unfortunately comes to a tragic end due to losing in a card game with a rapscallion named Jack Moreau and the sometimes honest but always gallant Cameo Kirby. Mr. Kirby in this instance had right on his side, for he goes into the gambling seance uninvited by Moreau, just to rescue Randall from a rascal's clutches.

Irving Cummings, the director, is responsible for many charming scenes in this production, the story of which is not highly dramatic. It would, however, be difficult to say where more could have been done with the play material, for it is the type of subject that does not stand much tampering.

Mr. Murray's pleasing songs, together with occasional choruses, enhance this Southern adventure. Mr. Murray also acts his part with a rational conception of the character. Robert Edeson deserves praise for his admirable portrayal of Colonel Randall and Douglas Gilmore is a glib and persistent Jack Moreau. The languid Stepin Fetchit seems so tired in this film that he makes slow-motion photography seem fast. He drawls a song in a way that gives one a clear conception of the character's dislike for toil.

An Interesting Theme.

SINCE the theme of "Caught in Berlin's Underworld," the German silent film at the Cameo last week, is so interesting and the film work so poor, one may hope that a talking film may be produced of the same idea, which is one concerned with the hard life of the children of criminals and their merciless treatment by society.

The narrative in this production is not at all badly worked out, except that there are some rather startling coincidences. It tells of a convict's son, whose mother, to safeguard him from the ostracism and harsh treatment by people, takes the boy to a prison warden interested in the theory of environment as it applies to the offsprings of felons. The boy is sent to a well-to-do family under a new name. When he is old enough he goes to a university, where one night a nobleman's son, also a student, challenges the convict's son, asking him who are his parents and where he was born. It seems here that the young man's secret has been permitted to leak out for the sake of the story. But be that as it may, there is a duel, and the convict's son is the victor.

There are other craftily contrived situations in which the nobleman and the felon's son come together. The hero's mother becomes the victim of an underworld drunkard, who tries to find out the name her son has taken so that he can blackmail either the young man or the people who have adopted him. Another angle to the film is that the convict's son falls in love with the daughter of the murdered warden of the prison—the man who was responsible for his being adopted by gentle folk—little knowing that his father's last crime was the slaying of that prison official.

Whatever rough corners this narrative may possess, they could be planed down. The film itself, while the acting is quite fair, darts from one scene to another and glosses over just the very years that ought to have been pictured at length.

THE ROXY'S GRANDEUR PICTURE

THE Grandeur film "Happy Days," in which the majority of the Fox stars appear, is now at the Roxy. This is the first production to be made expressly on the large film. The story of the photoplay involves a glorified minstrel show in which all the players appear.

Three years ago when the Roxy Theatre was under construction, its director visualized the enlarged screen of the future, and so great was his confidence in its ultimate perfection that provision was made for it in the original plans.

The installation of the new mechanism took six weeks. The work was done at night after the theatre was closed. Three projection specialists, eleven electricians, fourteen carpenters and eight masonry workers were required to carry on the work, while thirty or more men were needed to hoist the screen in place.

The dimensions of the Grandeur screen are 42 feet by 20 feet as compared with the 24 feet by 18 feet of the standard size. The film itself has been increased in width from .826 of an inch to 1.810 inches, while in height it has gone from .758 of an inch to .880. The sound track is more than three times the width of that of the old film. With the wider track the shadings and nuances of sound are permitted to issue forth in finer detail.

The screen itself is the twelfth of a series of experimental ones, the first eleven of which were discarded. It is made of finely woven cotton cloth, knit firmly together by a layer of adhesive. Over the entire surface a thin layer of finely ground glass is spread. This serves to equally diffuse the light, and the visibility is said to be as clear from the last row of the theatre as from the first. This factor also eliminates distortion of the image.

The picture "Happy Days" was directed by Benjamin Stoloff, with the stage direction under Walter Catlett.

SCREEN MUSIC

IRVING BERLIN, the composer of tunes that are heard in "Puttin' On the Ritz" at the Earl Carroll Theatre, did his work for the film in which Harry Richman, Joan Bennett, James Gleason and Lilyan Tashman appear, under circumstances and in an environment that contrasted sharply with those attending his first composition. "Marie From Sunny Italy" was the first Berlin song. "Puttin' On the Ritz" and "With You," both sung by Richman in the new picture, are his latest tunes.

"Marie From Sunny Italy" was composed when Mr. Berlin was a "singing waiter" in the café conducted by Jimmy Kelly in Union Square, shortly after young Israel Baline had left the employ of the illustrious "Nigger Mike" Salter. During those days one of Israel Baline's closest friends was Joseph M. Schenck, who arrived in America not many years before and who was a pharmacist's clerk in a Chatham Square drug store. That friendship has continued during the ensuing two and a half decades, and Mr. Berlin is even now occupying one of the bungalows at the United Artists Studio in Hollywood, over which Mr. Schenck presides. There the composer is arranging the production that will mark his début as a full-fledged film producer, "Love in a Cottage." It is being financed, as was "Puttin' On the Ritz," by the one-time pharmacist's clerk.

"With You" is sung in "Puttin' On the Ritz" by both Harry Richman and Joan Bennett, and this particular song has a very important part in the story of the film.

PROJECTION JOTTINGS

John McCormack Returns—"Heads Up" to Be Filmed in Color—Other Items

WHEN John McCormack, the noted Irish tenor, who recently completed "Song o' My Heart" for Fox and which will be given a Broadway première soon, arrived at the Grand Central Station last Tuesday, the seven photographers who were there to greet him were in such a feverish anticipation that they missed him completely, and it was not until half an hour later that they succeeded in corralling him at his home in Park Avenue.

There, appearing somewhat fatigued from his long trip and evidently worried because of his wife's and his daughter's illness, he good-naturedly posed for the camera men. He jocularly remarked that in his twenty years of arriving at the Grand Central Station he had never once been photographed as he dismounted from the train.

"But now," he continued, "that I am no longer the singer, but a motion picture player instead, I get this tremendous reception."

He will leave for his home in Ireland on Feb. 22, aboard the Majestic.

When "Heads Up," the screen musical version of the stage production, will be filmed at the Paramount Astoria studio, it will be made in Technicolor. The production will be photographed under the supervision of Technicolor experts who worked on Dennis King's film "The Vagabond King."

Leaving First National for a while, Dorothy Mackaill will replace Mae Clarke in the Fox production "A Very Practical Joke," in which Milton Sills will play the main part. Miss Mackaill has played opposite Mr. Sills in several other productions. William Harrigan and Kenneth McKenna are in the cast.

Paramount is awaiting Clara Bow's return from New York to commence filming "True to the Navy," the title of the Titian-haired actress's next picture. The photoplay is planned as a companion to "The Fleet's In," in which James Hall was seen in the leading male part.

In the new story Miss Bow will play a soda fountain attendant in a drug store who possesses the reputation for having a sweetheart on every one of Uncle Sam's warships. A gunner's mate provides the chief romantic interest in the film. Others in the cast have not yet been chosen. Frank Tuttle will direct this film.

Alice White will depart temporarily from her "Five-and-Ten-Girl" rôles to portray a member of the Junior League in her next film, "Man Crazy," which was written by Frederick K. Bowen

Richard Dix's second starring photoplay for Radio Pictures will be known as "Roughneck Lover." Lois Wilson will be seen as the leading feminine player.

"Three Flights Up," the film that First National is making, with Grant Withers and Sue Carol in the leading parts, has been started at their Hollywood studio. Mr. Withers recently finished playing in "Back Pay," opposite Corinne Griffith. This is Miss Carol's first appearance on the Warner lot, she having been a Fox player for some time.

Having appeared in enough newspaper films and plays to qualify him as a copy boy at least, Hugh O'Connell has made another comedy dealing with the city room for Warners. It was written by Russel Crouse and is titled "Find the Woman."

A recommendation for the establishment of a British Film Corporation with a capital of not less than £5,000,000 for the purpose of developing and distributing British films throughout the empire was made recently by J. Aubrey Rees, director of the British Empire Film Institute, at a meeting at the Westminster Club, according to The London Daily Telegraph.

"For the month ending Dec. 31, 1929, 126 foreign silent pictures and 233 foreign sound pictures were registered in London," Mr. Rees said, "of which nineteen were British silent and twenty-five British sound pictures."

The adaptation of Richard Connell's story "Solid Gold Article" will feature Inez Courtney and will be a Fox picture which Chandler Sprague will direct.

Talking motion picture rights to "The Prisoner of Zenda" have been acquired by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. This story was dramatized in 1895 and produced here during that year at the Lyceum Theatre.

After filming his production for two months, Carl Laemmle Jr. announces the completion of "All Quiet on the Western Front" within the next week. Most of the company has been on location on the Irvine Ranch, where a complete city for the housing of hundreds of soldiers, technicians and officials was constructed.

SOME NEW FILMS

NEXT Wednesday evening "The Vagabond King" will be presented on the screen of the Criterion Theatre. This natural-color production features Dennis King and is the screen version of the novel by Justin Huntly McCarthy, "If I Were King." Jeanette McDonald appears as the princess for whom François Villon defies a king and kingdom. O. P. Heggie, Warner Oland and Lillian Roth are in the cast.

THE Paramount is showing "Dangerous Paradise," an audible feature, with Nancy Carroll and Richard Arlen. In this adaptation of a story by Joseph Conrad the locale is set in the South Seas, with the two main players as the sole occupants of an island.

WINNIE LIGHTNER in "She Couldn't Say No" acts a dramatic part, a departure from her performances in "Gold Diggers" and "Show of Shows." Chester Morris has the principal male rôle in this production. Miss Lightner plays the part of a night club singer whose love for a racketeer is not requited. Her successful rival is a society girl, portrayed by Sally Eilers.

THE Hippodrome is offering an adaptation of the play by William Vaughn Moody, "The Great Divide," in which Dorothy Mackaill has the leading rôle. Ian Keith, Lucien Littlefield and Myrna Loy are also to be seen in this audible film.

A STORY of the United States Cavalry is "Troopers Three," which is now at the Gaiety Theatre. This film was written and supervised by Arthur Guy Empey, author of "Over the Top." The cast includes Rex Lease, Dorothy Gulliver, Roscoe Karns, Slim Summerville and Joseph Girard. Officers of the Eleventh United States Cavalry cooperated in the making of this picture.

LONDON FILM NOTES

A British Production Mystery—Anthony Asquith's Latest Picture

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

LONDON.

"WRAPT IN MYSTERY" might be suggested as the title for a new film which might be constructed round the tragicomic episode in which a beautiful star of the first magnitude in the film firmament, an illustrious performer on the pianoforte and one of the leading lights of British screen production play the principal rôles. For some months past the appetite of the English public has been whetted for a feast of reason and a flow of soul promised by preliminary announcements regarding the preparations for the making of an audible film to be called "Beethoven." Mr. Herbert Wilcox, who is at the head of British and Dominion Films, was to direct the production; and he had enlisted the support of Captain Reginald Berkeley, a young and successful English dramatist, author of "The Lady of the Lamp" and several other plays, for the writing of the scenario, and the services of Mr. Norman O'Neill, one of the most brilliant composers of the younger school in this country, to supply incidental music in harmony with some of the works of Beethoven's own composition which were to be introduced into the production. These latter were to be played on the piano by Mr. Mark Hambourg, who would enact the part of Beethoven, his qualifications including not only his undisputed proficiency in the rendering of the master's compositions but his extraordinary personal resemblance to Beethoven. Mr. Hambourg's command of four languages was a further asset, of which the utmost use was to be made, and the Beethoven film was to be a multilingual production, with every prospect of immediate success in the world's markets.

The Heroine Chosen.

Mr. Wilcox cast his eyes around the world for a suitable heroine and found Olga Baclanova. Negotiations were opened up and brought to a successful completion. Mme. Baclanova was the ideal woman for the rôle. She was well known to cinema patrons in two continents. She had appeared in "The Man Who Laughs," "Docks of New York" and "The Wolf of Wall Street," and also she spoke three languages, English, Russian and French, so that the feat of making a multilingual film would seem to present no difficulties.

Olga Baclanova crossed the Atlantic in a luxurious suite, accompanied by her husband, M. Nicholas Soussanine, whose face on the screen is not unfamiliar. Madame and her husband were received with a warm welcome. The rooms at her hotel were filled with flowers, an expensive motor car (if not two) was placed at her disposal. On her arrival she was asked if she was making her film at Elstree. "Elstree!" she said; "what is that?" "Our little Hollywood," some one explained to her. "Oh!" she said; "I've never heard of it!"

And now comes the mystery. Mme. Baclanova went to the studios at Elstree very soon after she came to London. And very soon after that she sailed back for America. Exactly what happened nobody seems to know—at any rate, those who do will not say. Baclanova was under contract to give six weeks of her time to the production of "Beethoven." Exactly how much of her time in England was passed at Elstree is not apparent, but it was certainly only a very short period.

Plans Gang A-gley.

Mr. Wilcox denies that it cost him £5,000 ($25,000) to bring Mme. Baclanova and her husband across the Atlantic, but he admits that he is out of pocket a not inconsiderable sum. He will not say where the responsibility lies for the plans of mice and men ganging a-gley in this matter. It is said there was no temperamental difficulty—that Baclanova and Mark Hambourg were on the happiest terms; and that certainly seemed to be the case one night when Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Hambourg (she is the daughter of Lord Muir Mackenzie) gave a party at their house in Regents Park at which Mme. Baclanova, Captain Berkeley, the host and others indulged in the mild but hilarious excitement of shilling poker. "We have had to readjust our plans," is all Mr. Wilcox will say, adding that he doesn't know who will have the part for which Baclanova had been cast and that the Beethoven picture has only been postponed and not abandoned.

Yet another hope of the emergence of the British film industry from the morass of slough and despond into which it has found its way has been abandoned with the trade showing of a new effort by Anthony Asquith. That this young man has ability even his worst enemies do not deny. At times, in fact, his work is even brilliant.

Anthony Asquith's Latest.

In "A Cottage on Dartmoor," which was begun as a silent film, sound effects have been introduced. The story is that of a convict escaped from Dartmoor prison. He reaches a cottage where a woman is bathing a baby. They recognize one another, and then the audience is told the tale of their past relations, three years previously. It appears the convict had been a barber and the woman a manicurist. He loved her, but she did not return his flame. A customer with whom she has fallen in love is being shaved by the barber, whose jealousy prompts him to cut his rival's throat. You see him about to do so—a rather ghoulish business—when the manicurist, observing the murderous look in the barber's eye, jumps up and saves her lover's life but cannot prevent his receiving a very unpleasant but apparently accidental gash from the razor. Exactly why the barber should be sent to jail because of an accident is not altogether clear. However, in the story he does, and it is after three years of imprisonment that he escapes and meets his former inamorata, upon whom, as well as upon his successful rival, he has vowed deep vengeance. Instead of that, we find the ex-manicurist and her husband heaping coals of fire upon the convict's head by hiding him from the pursuing prison warders and helping him to get away. The poor fellow is so hopelessly in love, however, that he can't live without the woman, and he returns to Dartmoor expecting to be shot by the warders.

The Story Flops.

Well, he is shot! And that's the sort of story with which the young hopefuls of the British film industry expect to gain "a place in the sun"! There are flashes of inspiration in "A Cottage on Dartmoor"—notably a parody of that sort of American film of which all the world has had a surfeit and which Hollywood at its worst would not reduplicate nowadays—and the acting by two Germans, Hans Schlettow, the star of "Volga-Volga" and "Homecoming," and Uno Henning, and by Miss Nora Baring is excellent, and the photography also is admirable. But more than all that is required to meet American or any other competition. Some of his admirers are convinced that Anthony Asquith will in course of time make a great film. Everybody hopes he will; but at present he gives the impression of not exactly knowing what he wants to do. It is said that while he is directing he carries about in his coat pockets a volume of Plato and Op. V of Beethoven. That's just the sort of thing to insure good money rolling in at the box-office.

"Hallelujah," King Vidor's negro "epic," has had a full meed of praise from the London critics, but among the new American importations to this country "Flight" has easily secured top honors. A well-known English dramatic critic told this correspondent the other day that after seeing "Flight" he came to the conclusion that the drama was doomed and that he was going to look out for a job as a critic of the cinema. He is not, however, going to give up his dramatic work so long as there are people who will not see the writing on the wall!

FILM FLASHES

DUE to an illness, Paul Fejos, director of "Broadway," who began to supervise the production of "La Marseillaise," resigned his duties temporarily while John S. Robertson took over the film's direction. Since the change several additional scenes have been written in so that now Stuart Holmes will be seen in the rôle of Louis XVI and Evelyn Hall in that of Marie Antoinette. Otis Harlan and Sam De Grasse have been added to the cast.

Mary Astor and Lloyd Hughes, who have been seen together in many films, will be reunited for the Radio Pictures' "Cooking Her Goose," an adaptation of an H. H. Van Loan play. Donald Crisp will direct this film.

Authors and playwrights who have been engaged and given additional contracts by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer include John Howard Lawson, who wrote the play "Processional," and Paul Dickey, author of "The Misleading Lady." Gene Markey has been retained to do an original story. William Hurlburt, the playwright responsible for "Bride of the Lamb," has been added to the company's writing staff.

The audience reaction to sound pictures in China has been favorable. A keen interest in audible films having English dialogue is shown, perhaps because the medium of English is often used by the Chinese to overcome the barrier of the diverse dialects within their own language.

In reporting the wiring of the Capitol for sound films, Budapest newspapers say that the conquest of the Hungarian capital by the audible pictures is practically complete, as five of the principal kino houses are now so equipped. The Capitol has installed the German Western Electric Company's system.

IN A VITAPHONE FILM

Winnie Lightner and Johnny Arthur in "She Couldn't Say No."

S. S. VAN DINE AT HOME

HE is the gentleman with the Vandyke. Wearer of the monocle. Smoker of a private brand of cigarette stored in an aluminum humidor separated into four compartments, all containing the same tobacco. Writer, pedagogue, critic, philosopher, connoisseur—he is S. S. Van Dine, author of five mystery stories, three of which have been brought to the screen. He stands and talks while you sit and listen, he sits and listens while you stand and talk.

If you go to see him at the gray stone house which is set back on a concrete walk behind a grilled iron gate you will find two mailboxes for him. One reads "S. S. Van Dine," in boldface type; the other, "Willard Huntington Wright," in Tiffany script. The latter is his correct name, under which he wrote his books on art and esthetics. The house he lives in is the approximate site of the main murder in "The Bishop Murder Case," on Seventy-fifth Street, near West End Avenue, and appears quite as ominous as its literary and screen prototypes.

When you have swept past the cylindrical umbrella holder in the foyer of Mr. Wright's (or is it Mr. Van Dine's?) apartment in which more than a dozen walking sticks are stored you will find the author awaiting you in the middle of his large study.

But now he is neither the detective story writer, hardly resembling a retired police sergeant, nor the art critic, judging by his meticulous blue double-breasted jacket, ivory cigarette holder and suave manner, but more inclined to look like Philo Vance, the cultured sleuth of his "Murder Case" series.

Cezannes and Kittens.

Surrounded by a collection of modern paintings, including two original Cezannes (Philo Vance collected Cezanne), he will first chase his two Chartreuse kittens off to a corner where they can do little damage, and expatiate on almost any subject you may choose to offer, whether it be the stock market, art in films, Modigliani, Kuniyoshi or Dubonnet, all familiar ground to him.

"I believe it a good practice for film companies to keep the author off the set while making a picture," he offered. "I think that films should be given to the public solely as good entertainment, not as an art form. The time is not ripe for that yet."

He did, however, have a scheme whereby such an element might profitably be introduced in the production of motion pictures. This plan would call for the establishment of a minor production unit in one of the larger studios that would turn out films not calculated to cater to mentalities demanding overstressed sex, superabundance of action and the other elements usually attributed by "high brows" to so many cinema works.

This unit would work on stages that have already been constructed during times when they were not in use by the major units. There would be a slight overhead expense, but not nearly so much as if the picture were being made through the accepted means.

Another point Mr. Van Dine makes is that the picture would be released along with the wholesale booking plan now generally in operation and which it would probably not make so much money as a feature, nevertheless would serve as an educator for good taste and better quality in future photoplays.

Mr. Van Dine's next mystery story will be his sixth and last. After this he will retire from the field of detective fiction as one of the best read and most authoritative persons on matters dealing with the solution of crime; a record in the sale of detective story fiction which, he said, surpasses any previous book sale in the history of like fiction, and a pecuniary fund sufficient to carry him through his return to the field of esthetics.

Future Work.

His next book, in fact, is to be one on philology, for which he has collected notes to the amount of 300,000 words. His future works will be apart from the motion picture, since he does not see the possibility of painting ever surrendering its place to the more graphic form. He insists on the cinema only as entertainment.

Mr. Van Dine did have a connection with motion pictures back in the days when films were voiceless and more or less artless. He became interested then in a venture to produce "The Rubaiyat" as a film. He was even made art director of the enterprise and went so far as to complete plans for its filmization. Prohibitive costs, however, made his group realize the impossibility of adequately making an artistic work on a monetary shoestring, so it was abandoned.

Mr. Van Dine smokes incessantly of his particular brand of cigarette. He takes great pride in his collection of paintings and will run upstairs to bring down examples of what he thinks are best in American or French art which he owns. He has an extensive library on painting, another of more than 2,000 volumes of detective stories and a third composed chiefly of reference books with a number of "Who's Who" included. His books that were being used at the moment, a commentary on the literary tastes of a philomath, were "The Tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen" and "A History of Economics."

A NEW FAGIN

LIONEL BARRYMORE will again appear before the cameras when he will play Fagin, the suave and cunning rogue of Dickens's "Oliver Twist," the talking version which M.-G.-M. will make of the classic.

Mr. Barrymore will direct as well as play in the picture and Ruth Chatterton will act the rôle of Nancy. No juvenile player for the rôle of Oliver has yet been chosen. Samuel Shipman and John B. Hymer are preparing the screen adaptation.

The new Radio Pictures Hollywood studio, which is rapidly nearing completion, is 500 by 150 feet and four companies may work in the building at the same time. The studio is five stories high, contains a 100,000-gallon water tank and has floors of the "floating" variety, meaning that they do not touch the outside walls and thereby avoid ground rumbles. There is a monorail system for moving scenery. Other features include hydraulic doors.

The heroine's rôle in "Heart of the North," a First National production, will be played by Loretta Young.

Ronald Colman, Dudley Digges, Ann Harding and Louis Wolheim in "Condemned."

M. EISENSTEIN'S NEXT FILM

Russian Director Intends to Make Ideal Combination of Color and Sound

AN ideal combination of color and sound for his next film is the goal set for himself by S. M. Eisenstein, the first of the great Russian directors to become generally known to the moving-picture world outside the Soviet Union. He is still scornful of the "all talkies," and labels them "rotten trash." Nevertheless, he is trying to keep right up to the minute regarding their development.

These points are brought out in an interview with the Russian director printed in a recent number of Het Volk of Amsterdam, the official daily organ of the Dutch Socialists. It appears that Eisenstein has received a year's "leave of absence" from the Soviet Union, part of which he is devoting to visiting Paris, London and Berlin, as well as other European film centres before making his long-talked-of trip to Hollywood, after which he expects to return to his native land with his mind enriched by many and varied observations. The Dutch newspaperman caught the Russian director in Rotterdam, where he had come to lecture before the Rotterdam section of the Netherland Film League.

Film Nearing Completion.

After Tovaristch Eisenstein had explained that he was making occasional brief visits to London in the interest of the synchronization of "The General Line," the film showing the speeding up of agricuultural production as the result of the rapid growth of State farms and collectives in Russia and the effects of this change upon life in the villages, he noted that at last this much-delayed work was nearing completion and would soon be shown in Berlin. When this job is finished Eisenstein intends to start for the United States, where "The General Line" is to be presented under the new title of "Old and New."

In reply to a query as to why he experimented so much and if he thought the film's technical resources were so insufficient, he said:

"Naturally. Technique doesn't stand still. We must be on the job all the time and test every new technical method as to its practicability."

"The sound film, too?"

"Why, of course."

"Now what is your real attitude toward the sound film?"

Eisenstein's cheerful face became serious as he answered:

"Now I am going to tell you all about it. I consider the so-called 'all talkie,' the film with conversation from beginning to end, nothing but rotten trash. The sound part of the American and German films is a luxury, an element that has just happened to be added to them, but which has nothing to do with the films themselves. With the Russian film it is quite different. We always have needed sound and we have tried to suggest it through optical methods. This is bound to remain incomplete. You can't produce sound effects with pictures. For us the invention of the sound film is very timely. So we are expecting a great deal. I always have been annoyed by the accompanying music which was bound to injure my films, so I am glad that I can lay down the limits of the synchronized music myself and can use the sound to strengthen the effect of my pictures. If I had only been able to use it in 'Potemkin'! Now I am looking for an ideal combination of color and sound."

"Color?" interjected the interviewer.

Snobs of the Screen.

"Yes, why not?" replied Eisenstein. "If it only is pretty. Only snobs can always remain satisfied with the 'black-and-white' art. All fixed forms are bound to run into blind alleys. We might put it this way: Our new ideology makes us have something to say to the world. And a person with something to say looks for the means to express his thoughts in the most impressive manner. Anything that can be used with the film is welcomed by me, whether it be color or sound. Only a new ideology produces new forms, because it makes you think and forces you to experiment. All the rest is mere 'play.' Just now I expect great things from color. If the process that I am studying, with my faithful collaborators Alexandrof and Tissé, turns out to be efficient, an enormous field of action will be opened.

"If Rembrandt were to return to the world he certainly would become a film director, not a painter. The French 'Avant-Garde-Film' has nothing to tell the world and, consequently, is sinking into refinement and snobism. But we, who must reach our working people in order to elevate them, are always on the watch for something new which will enable us to spread out our wings still more boldly so as to become still more convincing."

"And how about the spoken word?"

"I tell you that the 'all talkie' is rotten trash. There is nothing of the film left in it. But a film with 10 per cent dialogue, for example, can be striking and I am determined to adapt my work to this proportion."

"In which film?"

"In 'Capital' by Marx."

"Can you tell us something about it?"

"Yes, of course. But I won't do it. Business secrets, my friend."

Russians and Films.

"And can the Russian masses absorb the new forms?"

"In the big cities, yes, but the village public is not yet accustomed to them. The peasants are slower. Their brains function more lazily. That's why the 'short cutting' goes too fast for them. Unless the subject is so fascinating that they are all concentrated and watch the film with intense interest. Such was the case with 'Potemkin.'"

"Are you still alone in your opinion that the masses must act, not the individual?"

"No, I have won out, thanks to my lessons at the Film High School."

"Haven't your fellow-workers disappointed you?"

"Never. It can't be otherwise. When workers show their own lives, their own struggles, can you imagine any better 'acting'? They work with unquenchable enthusiasm. You can do anything with them."

In response to a question if he was acquainted with Joris Ivens, the young Dutch director whose film work is attracting favorable attention in several European centres, Eisenstein said:

"Yes. A clever boy. He'll make good. He is stopping at my house in Moscow now. I am glad that the Russians are now learning about his work. Up to now we had to get our impressions from photos."

"How is it that the Russians produce so few comics?"

"We have too much serious work to do to allow ourselves the luxury of farces. When we do become 'comic,' we are really satirical, as in 'The Three Thieves,' which I, incidentally, consider a poor film."

A Series of Photographs.

"How did you like 'Jeanne d'Arc'?"

"Very interesting and beautiful, but not a film. Rather a series of wonderful photographs. Furthermore, I don't find much in individualism. Most of the psycho-analytical films, such as 'Le Chien Andalou,' are repugnant to me. An entirely upside-down adaptation of the Freudian ideas. In fact, such a film is only the psycho-analytical passport of the author. To my notion, Freud can only be of use in making the submerged consciousness of the masses positive. All the erotic feelings of an individual can be of little importance to us in the end. Do they show many Russian films here?"

"They are gaining, although every once in a while one is barred."

Then Eisenstein closed the interview with, "Now, let's quit. We have chatted too long and, after all, we are human beings, too. Now let's enjoy more of the sights of your wonderful harbor!"

The Dutch Docks.

Het Volk's reporter notes that the most interesting parts of Rotterdam for the Russian director were the docks and the shipyards, where he gave close attention to the activities of the Dutch workers and the functioning of the most modern machinery. About 230 years earlier, another well-known Russian, called Peter the Great, also found the Dutch shipyards interesting.

In his lecture in Rotterdam Eisenstein gave the usual outline of the activities of the Russian film industry and frankly admitted the propaganda character of most of its work.

CHILEAN FILM MAKER

SOMETHING of a film king himself down in his native Andes, Señor Jorge Delano of Chile will approach Hollywood and the American film industry with no naïveté. In Santiago he draws cartoons for La Nación, produces his own films, sometimes acts in them, and sponsors the popular Hollywood brand for his fellow-citizens.

They like American films in Chile. Santiago, with a population of over 700,000, has more than a dozen picture houses, several of which can accomodate 5,000 patrons at one time. Quite a good proportion of the pictures shown are English-speaking. The English language is required in all Chilean schools under government supervision but naturally not every one speaks the language of the northern neighbor.

This handicap, however, doesn't make the slightest bit of difference in the movie trade, be the films English or Spanish. There is a seeming satisfaction, to the keen mind, in a mere succession of happy pictures, even though the labels and tags interjected may be Chinese.

Those who understand without titles, and there are plenty who do, are rapidly picking up the American idiom and lust for more. While such swaggering American creations as "And how" and "Check and double check" are being invested with astringent properties in blasé North American cities, the Chilean swain, or vaquero, or whatever compares to our young men here, can imagine nothing more rakish than casually delivering these lingual gems.

Seriously, Mr. Delano pointed out, there is a tremendous influence exercised on the life of the people by foreign films appearing in Chilean cities. He wants to arrange for more of these and will also try to complete an agreement by which some of the American films may be transformed into Spanish versions.

After all, Chile is Chile and so will remain if President Ibáñez has anything to contribute to the cause. If American films intrude too hungrily, pushing the more temperamental, gentle Southern stories from Chilean screens, what will become of native individuality, especially with talkies now creeping in?

Incidentally, Mr. Delano reported that one house in Santiago is now installing talking devices and will be displaying American talking pictures shortly. He will make a study of the mechanics of the sound film while in New York and Hollywood to keep his organization, the Andes Film Company, abreast of the times.

Mr. Delano will be in New York for two months and spend four months on the west coast.

Fox's first production on the 1930-31 schedule will be "The Man Who Came Back," an adaptation of the play by Jules Eckert Goodman.

NEW COLOR FILM PROCESS

CARL FREUND, expert cameraman and innovator of a new technique subsequently dubbed "angles" in motion-picture photography, has come to the United States to work on a new process for developing colored films. After a few weeks of laboratory work in the Paramount Astoria Studio he went to California, where he will put his experiments to practical use for the Technicolor Corporation.

Mr. Freund, a portly German, speaking a three months' knowledge of English that was naturally tinged with a Teutonic accent, described the introduction of camera stunts that have since descended upon some American productions.

It was during the making of "Variety," the German film of life under the "big top" and on the stage, that Freund first had the opportunity to exercise his cameras to their full mobile use. There was a big scene to be "shot" within a music hall during which the trapeze artists in the film were to swing far out over the heads of the audience and in which sequences several of the more telling dramatic episodes were to take place.

Mr. Freund urged Mr. Dupont, the director, to allow the scene to be taken in the Winter Palace in Berlin, where, he argued, the background would be authentic despite tographers that the actual setting lacks the glamour of a studio-built one.

Work in a Theatre.

The locale of the story was then removed from the studio to the interior of the theatre. Physical obstructions, such as railings, columns, blocks of seats and the inevitable fourth wall that is ordinarily absent in a film studio, presented a the views of some directors and phonumber of difficulties for the cameraman., It was on this account, according to Mr. Freund, that his camera was forced into what previously had been considered impossible positions from which to photograph a scene.

Cramped quarters in the theatre forced him down on his stomach, made him push his camera from around intervening posts and also set his photographing apparatus in motion. The finished "Variety" will attest to the success of the experiment. Almost every director of photo plays has since used some variation of the angular technique. And although a moving camera is by no means the invention of Mr. Freund, its use having been noted in an early Italian film "Cabiria," made about fifteen years ago, it was at least the most successfully continued use of the moving lens throughout a single photoplay.

Mr. Freund has brought with him from Germany a color-printing process in photography. The photographing of the film in color is similar to the Kodacolor method used by Eastman. This means that there are thousands of tiny lenses on the film's surface, which when developed for color cannot be reprinted in duplicate. This camera technician's method, as yet unrevealed, permits the duplication of any number of color prints employing all three primary colors. The majority of color films now make use of only two primaries.

Steel for Sound Recording.

Mr. Freund also brouhgt a new process for recording on a strip of magnetized steel, the invention of a German scientist. Its particular advantages include its imperviousness to scratches, a common disadvantage, it is said, of celluloid film. This narrow strip of magnetized metal takes on the sound track without any signs evident of the sound's presence. There is no etched graph on the steel's surface and therefore nothing that may be marred in handling or developing.

With such a track, according to Mr. Freund, one may go to the interior of Africa, record the sounds of the jungle, and, without sending the film any further for development or printing, run a "playback" immediately following tha recording. Later, in the laboratory, the sound from the strip is transferred by a special process to another surface which is synchronized with the images on the celluloid.

The photographic expert predicted a revolution in projection machines in the near future when the large and cumbersome projectors would be eliminated for a small, compact outfit that would be portable as well as useful in a large theatre.

He said that new color processes were developing every day, and that 1930 would see an entirely new range of shades. He was greatly disappointed with the talking films being shown along Broadway because of their artificiality and said that such a film as Ernest Schoedsack is now making in Borneo and near-by places was the only real kind of audible picture worth while.

Mr. Schoedsack, it might be added, is in the Dutch East Indies making another nature film, perhaps similar to "Chang," this time with a sound apparatus to catch the noises he missed in other films.

The German photographer was responsible for the camera work in such films seen here as "The Last Laugh," "Variety," "Tartuffe the Hypocrite," "Metropolis" and "Beren."

ANOTHER WAR FILM

"Men Without Women," the film now at the Roxy, was written by two former newspaper men, Dudley Nichols and James K. McGuinness.

When Mr. McGuinness approached the problem of fitting a story to the idea, he was confronted with what seemed to be a formidable obstacle. To introduce a woman as a passenger on a sunken submarine involved too great a strain on credibility and pictures just have not been made without women. It is reported that there were many conferences between MeGuinness and Fox officials before a decision was reached to discard the convention and make a picture with men only in the cast. The matter once settled, however, they went the whole way and emphasized their unorthodoxy in selecting "Men Without Women" as a title.

For his story Mr. McGuinness chose to pick up the threads of an unsolved mystery of the World War, the death at sea, under unexplained circumstances, of a famous soldier and national hero of Great Britain. Kenneth MacKenna was given the leading rôle and other parts were assigned to Frank Albertson, Paul Page, Walter McGrail and Warren Hymer.

VAUDEVILLE

PALACE—Anne Pennington is dancing her way to the headline spot at the First Variety Hall this week—the same Miss Pennington who used to find her way around pretty well in the "Scandals" and the "Follies" and one show and another. Jack Pettis and his orchestra appear and play in support of her. Phil Bak r remains for a third week (this gives Mr. Baker one up, or a "triumph"), and in addition is acting as master of ceremonies. Something pretty humorous may come out of this. Other entertainers are Harry Carroll and his revue, Emmett Keane and Claire Whitney, Willie, West and McGinty, the Danny Small Company, Leslie Strange and, finally, Joe Bonomo, who lifts weights.

RIVERSIDE—For the first half of the week the Phillips Family, numbering three, are the chief attraction, along with "Glad Rags" (a revue), and White and Manning. William Ebs will open on Wednesday, and Mr. Ebs is, frankly, a ventriloquist.

LOEW'S STATE—Jack Osterman is here for the week in the spot commonly allotted to headliners. Billy and Elsa Newell are a strong supporting act. Other numbers are Modena's "Art Flashes of 1930," the Mangean Troupe, the Three Tiffany Boys and Loyal's Arabian Stallions.

EIGHTY-FIRST STREET—Charles (Slim) Timblin's blackface skit has found its way up here and will remain until Wednesday. Beginning at midweek; oJsephine Harmon, Harrison and Dakin and the Luster Brothers.

HIPPODROME—Six stage acts are in ambush of a motion picture here, and they include Glenn and Jenkins, the "Kitchen Pirates Revue" and Lauren and La Dare.

PROCTOR'S FIFTY-EIGHTH STREET—That consistently amusing pantomimist, Jimmy Savo, will be here for two days more on a bill which also has Arthur and Morton Havel. The Havels are quite a pair—cutups, &c. George K. Arthur will open on Wednesday for a three-day engagement in his military travesty.

PROCTOR'S EIGHTY-SIXTH STREET—Johnny Marvin croons to his ukulele, and that's the headline act for this theatre until Wednesday. Later in the week Ricardo Cortez will make a personal appearance. A second consideration is that Mr. Cortez will also appear in a one-act play.

E. F. ALBEE (Brooklyn)—Henry Santrey's "Soldiers of Fortune" (a round-about way of saying that Mr. Santrey has an orchestra) are playing some selections animated by singing and dancing. Corinne Tilton is on the bill for a cycle of songs and monologues, and those almond-eyed beauties have returned in the Chinese Whoopee Revue. They will all be here for a week.

'FAUST' AND A TENOR

Some Forgotten Facts and Distinctions of Gounod's Opera on Broadway

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE arrival in New York of a French tenor of the older school of singing who had come here preceded by a reputation caused the opera "Faust" to be utilized by the Metropolitan Opera Company as the vehicle for his début. This occasion, in turn, caused hardened reviewers who had sedulously avoided presentations of this opera, long relegated to the limbo of decaying things, to go and hear the old masterpiece once more. For masterpiece, in and of its kind, it is.

Thus it is possible for even the case-hardened to enjoy "Faust." This score synchronized with Wagner's "Tristan." It preceded "Meistersinger," the "Ring" and "Parsifal." Although its libretto utilizes episodes of Goethe's poem, the spirit of that poem is Gallicized. From the standpoint of musical illumination of the original work, there is no comparison between this opera and the "Mefistofele" of Boito, which has poetical and highly original pages; nor is the "Faust" of Gounod nearly equal in modernity, imagination and sympathy with Goethe's purpose to the "Damnation of Faust" of Hector Berlioz, which preceded it by some years. If we pass from the domain of choral and operatic works to music for orchestra, Gounod is not less than a rank sentimentalist by the side of Wagner of the youthfully composed "Faust" overture, originally intended as the first movement of a symphony which Wagner never completed. Gounod is still further from the characterization, the suggestive power and the mystical color of much of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. Liszt, who portrayed Faust with remarkably psychological accent, supplied the best and the most tender portrait of Marguerite that is extant in tones; his "Mephistopheles" movement is one of the most original creations of its period. All these things the "Faust" of Gounod is not. Yet it is a score worthy of the most respectful study.

WHEN an opera has lived as long as this one—and a writer in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians designates it as the most successful opera ever composed—it must have its very exceptional qualities. It would pay those who sniff at "Faust" and other of the older operas of the current repertory to seek for the explanation of their longevity. For explanation there is, if critical examiners will lay aside individual preconceptions and conventional standards of criticism. Why not only a "Faust" but a "Trovatore," a "Lucia di Lammermoor"? It does not suffice to say of the latter opera, for example, that it is kept alive because it is a vehicle for a prima donna, or of "Trovatore" that it continues to exist because of the fondness of the public for ear-tickling tunes. No doubt these considerations have force, but there are operas far more showy and difficult to sing than "Lucia," just as there are operas with as many melodies and choruses in them as "Trovatore." Other reasons for their popularity must be supplied. Theories, pronouncements, propaganda and criticism to the contrary, it is not necessary to be a follower of Gluck or Wagner or the later Verdi or Debussy to make a passage in an opera go over the footlights. A flash of imperious inspiration, and once more the thing is done. As for "Faust," it is obviously an opera of an epoch far behind us, but its tenacity of life is amazing, or would be if it were not for the formal balance and finish of its style and its very authentic musical inspiration.

AN opera as original in its day as this one offers many problems of form and technique. These problems are answered in considerable part by the librettist. Scenario and text accomplish the preliminary engineering feats for the composer. They chart his musical course for him. But few indeed have been the librettos that have remained unchanged in many particulars after the composer and the authorities of the opera house which gave the first production had finished with them. The most carefully laid plans have to be modified with two principal criteria in view. The first is that of practical exigencies of the theatre. The second is the needs of the music, which, in order to be effective and generally organic cannot be merely flung about a verbal scaffolding as a garment is flung on a hanger. These problems undergo their final adjustments at the hands of the composer. The primary virtue and distinction of "Faust" rest heavily upon the felicity and inspiration with which the accomplished Gounod met them. If any one unacquainted with the circumstances of the "Faust" première of 1859 has looked upon him as a dilettante or trifler, let him examine the opera as it stands today and compare it with the form of the original score.

"Faust," which originally had spoken dialogue, was first given as a "grand opera," with recitatives, in Strasbourg in 1860. There were many revisions of the score before the 1859 production. A scene between Faust, Siebel and Wagner in Faust's study was suppressed; likewise passages of dialogue in the Kirmess scene; likewise a duet of Marguerite and Valentine before she meets Faust. There were changes in the Garden scene, of which the form as it now stands is an unsurpassable model of its kind. There were changes in the structure of Faust's air, "Salut, demeure chaste et pure."

In the third act Gounod substituted the "Soldiers' Chorus"—transplanted from another opera, "Ivan le terrible," which never saw the boards—for a mocking song sung by Lise at the fountain and a laughing chorus, of which only a vestige remains. Dialogue between Faust and Mephistopheles in the Church scene was eliminated. It was the composer's intention to have the death of Valentine precede the Church scene, but the direction the Théâtre-Lyrique reversed the order of the scenes, considering that the change made a more effective curtain. There were changes in the Walpurgis Night scene which do not matter, for it is all poor music and is seldom given anyhow. One of the passages struck out was a chorus of flying witches. There was originally a soliloquy of Marguerite in the Prison scene. One wonders what its nature would have been—whether Gounod, essentially a lyricist, could have risen to this moment as he has risen fairly well to Marguerite's vision of Mephistopheles in the church. The soliloquy of Marguerite, utilized by Boito in "Mefistofele," is one of the simplest, the most poetic, the most moving of any that have been inspired by Goethe's Gretchen.

When "Faust" was prepared for the Paris Opéra, Gounod was asked to compose a ballet. He was at first reluctant to do so, being in a mystical mood, unwilling to write profane music.

It is said that Gounod was incited to the composition of "Faust" by the work of Berlioz, performed in Paris thirteen years before the opera saw the light. But Gounod himself said that after an early reading of "Faust" he had been seventeen years in making scattered notes and sketches for the opera. He had read the poem as early as 1838. He was shrewdly critical of French dramas on this subject, with which he took pains to acquaint himself. Composing his own opera, on a theme which fascinated him, he adapted himself and his music to the conventions of his time, as Thomas did with much worse distortion of another work of Goethe's in "Mignon" and as Bizet did with the operatic version of Merrimée's "Carmen."

NEVERTHELESS, "Faust" stands today an opera of conspicuous sincerity, individuality, refinement and distinction of style. It was not understood at first. The critics, when they were not indignant, were puzzled, although d'Ortigue said that "the writer of the Garden scene is not only a great composer, he is also a great poet." Here in New York, in 1863, the inhabitants were shocked by the "frankness" of the scene at the window of Marguerite's dwelling at the end of the second act. Careful mothers were advised not to take their daughters to the performance. In 1859 Bizet's harmonies, as witness the chromaticism of certain passages, aroused distrust and ire. His style was wholly his own and unappreciated. The ornate melodic manner of Italian composers, the flashly gimcracks and parades of Meyerbeer, were eschewed by Gounod, who, so far as his remarkable talent and his limited horizon permitted, subjected all operatic forms to the test of dramatic appositeness and sincerity. Gounod's librettists did make a transposition of Marguerite's character from that of a peasant girl to a grande dame. The composer gave her the Jewel Song and other frippery. But this is not inapropos. Certain songs are superfluous, such as those of Siebel to Marguerite in the fourth act, which are often omitted today. But whether the quality of Gounod's invention is good or poor, he remains, as a composer, aware of the dramatic situation.

What genuineness, inspiration and finish of workmanship are shown in this work! The melodic line is usually soft and sensuous, but how beautiful the curve of the phrase—what a finished product of Gounod's feeling and voluptuous sentiment. The orchestration is a perfect model of taste and beauty. Is there a better balanced score, or one more finished and accomplished in its technique, than this one? The writing for the voices is just as charming and distinguished in manner. To sing the arias well is to have a perfect method and style of singing. To listen to them, properly sung and directed, is to be moved as one is always moved by a thing which has been created in sincerity and inspiration, and with feeling for beauty. And d'Ortigue was right: the composer of the Garden scene is a composer of prodigious gifts and of a truly poetical spirit. The act is an admirably woven series of dramatic and musical sequences, in which invention is unfaltering and workmanship sure. The scene moves inevitably to its climax as Marguerite proclaims her passion to the stars. This is the one place where the modern music-lover might desire a more intense and sonorous orchestral style—which would nevertheless be out of frame with the rest of the work.

How many other operas can display such an intimate and admirable correspondence between material and form, subject-matter and technique, text which asks precisely the music that Gounod provided to convey its meaning? We are likely to forget that in the temple of art there are a great many niches, and that certain laws of beauty and symmetry which we cannot precisely analyze or explain may operate in forms as modest as they are nevertheless eloquent and appropriate. Gounod's own estimate of "Faust" was amusing, and illustrative of a composer's difficulty in evaluating his own work. "The Garden scene. Yes, I have been guilty of many faults. Sometimes I feel remorse—only at times—because there are also many people who owe to this scene their happiness!"

THE FONTAINEBLEAU SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

WALTER DAMROSCH will head the American delegation which will go to France this Summer to participate in the tenth anniversary celebration of the Fontainebleau School of Music. The celebration will take place under the auspices of the French Government, which operates the school exclusively for American music students.

At the same time 180 students who are to attend the Summer sessions of the school will sail. These students are now being selected from hundreds of applications received from every State. As part of the anniversary activities they will participate in an elaborate pageant to be staged on the lake in front of Fontainebleau Palace. M. François Poncet, Minister of Fine Arts of France, will be present. Prominent among those who will go with Mr. Damrosch as representatives of this country are Harry Harkness Flagler, director of the American committee of Fontainebleau School of Music; Francis Rogers, chairman of the committee, and Miss Polly Damrosch, president of the Alumni Association.

FRENCH MUSIC NOTES.

An unknown work by Max Antoine Charpentier, "La Descente d'Orphée aux Enfers," has been unearthed in the archives of the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale. The opera, which is in manuscript, was composed in 1688 for the Duchesse de Guise, and was performed at her house. The third act is missing. It is, we are told, worthy of the composer, who lived in Paris from 1634 to 1704.

A distinguished French critic of music and of the dance, Dr. Stephen Chauvet, in his recent work, "Negro Music," passes a judgment which may be disconcerting to some who have had other notions in the matter. "There is nothing less specifically negro," he says, "nothing that resembles real African negro music less than jazz."

Darius Milhaud's "Columbus," the book by Paul Claudel, is scheduled for its German première in March at the Berlin Staatsoper Unter den Linden.

The sixtieth anniversary of Berlioz's death was observed at Plauen, Saxony, by a performance of "Béatrice et Bénédict."

Schott has just published a cembalo concerto by Wilhelm Maler.

'LE ROI D'YVETOT' IN PARIS

By HENRY PRUNIERES.

PARIS, Feb. 1, 1930.

IN mounting Jacques Ibert's "Le Roi d'Yvetot" the Opéra-Comique has finally produced a true "opéra-comique," worthy of the old-time repertory so unjustly neglected. Here there is no question of a pastiche, but of a work of genuine inspiration, modern in style, and modeled on the former plan of alternate scenes of talking and singing, which has been, since "Carmen," almost wholly abandoned. Yet what could be more legitimate than to let the characters speak in dialogue instead of expressing themselves in a recitative which retards the action and is often not understood? In this new opera the music begins when there is a place for it, and when the characters have occasion to sing and not to declaim musically.

Moreover, M. Ibert excels in manipulating the transitions between speech and song with recitative phrases and with skillful entries of the orchestral instruments. The book is the work of Jean Limozin and A. de la Tourrasse, authors of the remarkable libretto for the "Poirier de Misère."

The subject, perhaps, may be thought rather trivial; it derives freely from the song of the "Roi d'Yvetot" of Berenger. Over the village of Yvetot in a Normandy of legend reigns a debonair monarch who watches over his orchards and his cattle like a true farmer. The inhabitants of the neighboring village harass his subjects and beat them unmercifully. In spite of himself he feels constrained to go to war, mounted on an ass, but he is beaten, and his subjects, in revolt, proclaim a republic. Everything going from bad to worse, the women take charge of affairs, restore the king to his throne amid the acclamations of the populace, and all ends happily with the monarch marrying his servant, Jeanneton, the leader of the counter-revolution.

Jacques Ibert is a remarkable musician. There is perhaps not a single member of the new generation who knows his métier as well as he. In these times when the greater part of the young people have greater pretentions than knowledge, one finds real satisfaction in finding a true musician who is acquainted with all the subtleties, all the resources of his art. None better than Ibert knows how to make the most of a melodic idea.

Jacques Ibert attaches directly to the school of Ravel. Doubtless he may be reproached with not having sufficient individuality, with being content to employ with supreme skill all the resources of the marvelous musical language created by Fauré, Debussy and Ravel.

He delights in the stark style which Ravel has so charmingly used in "L'Enfant et les Sortilèges," and thus often arrives at the "bare flesh of emotion" for which Debussy strove. The pretty lullaby which ends the first act, "Là mon agneau," is a model of this genre. Also to be admired in Ibert is the perfect taste, the tact, which enable him to avoid all threatening shoals. He has succeeded in writing a genuine romance without for one instant giving us the impression of banality. I do not know many musicians today who are capable of a similar tour de force.

FROM the beginning to the end of the score the chorus is ever on the scene, for it is the populace which is the protagonist of the piece. These choruses are treated with verve, written with a deft pen, in several parts extremely realistic. The Song of the King of Yvetot in the last act resounds with a truculence worthy of Chabrier. This, however, is not the dominant quality in Ibert, and in spite of a glowing orchestra he rarely succeeds in achieving what may be termed the epic in comedy.

Here and there are bouffe scenes of genuine effectiveness, notably that of the return of the warriors and the discourse of the fat innkeeper to rouse the people against the king; but they are the exception. In general Ibert remains too distingué, too delicate, too refined, to indulge in Rabelaisian laughter. Greater caricature, brutality, and even grossness might have been employed to good advantage in the telling of this story.

With these reservations and criticisms of details, the work on the whole is ingratiating, vivacious, and charming. It is long since we have heard new music of such quality at the Opéra-Comique. The performance was excellent. In the cast were Emma Luart and Calvet, Musy, Oger, and the superb Bourdin, the best lyric comedian in France today. The orchestra was brilliantly directed by Albert Wolff. The settings by Moulaert, in the folk manner, were colorful and picturesque.

KRENEK'S NEW OPERA

Premiere of "The Life of Orestes" by Composer of "Jonny" Is Staged at Leipzig

By ALFRED EINSTEIN.

BERLIN, Feb. 3, 1930.

FROM the city of Leipzig the fame of "Jonny" went forth, and it is quite possible that a similar short-lived fame of "The Life of Orestes" will go forth from this same city, for despite the diversity of the material, there is a certain family resemblance between "Jonny" and this "Orestes"—the same stage business, the same lack of scruple regarding means, the same aim to create a period play, nothing more or less.

"The Life of Orestes" is a title for an epic work, not for a dramatic one or for an opera. Krenek, however, has made an opera out of it, which must needs be a "grand opera" in five acts and eight scenes; eight scenes which range from the exodus of Agamemnon to Troy down to the expiation of Orestes. It is material which gathers together that of the two versions of "Iphigenia" by Gluck, of Richard Strauss's "Elektra" and of much else into a single sequence.

The result, however, has not been a wholly genuine dramatic work. The individual scenes are connected by a prologue and epilogue narrated by the chorus, as in Shakespeare's "King" dramas. Before the opera, Krenek divulges himself through the chorus's hymn-like motto, which extols the land of the south as the Cockaigne of its yearning. The climatic contrast between the sunny land of the Mediterranean and the cold and gloomy north, so says the composer-poet, plays a big rôle in this opera.

His work stands or falls with this "local coloring," this "geographical" antithesis of northland and southland. The "period coloring" self-evidently has no significance whatever. The work would fail utterly if it were grounded upon the latter antithesis.

SINCE the period coloring is of no significance whatever in this "Life of Orestes," the query prompts itself: Why has Krenek made use of this vast material? He made use of it because he is really the usufructuary and not the creator. It did not enter his head to wish to write an antique or antiquated drama. He took this tale of a branch of the Atrides as a theme because it seemed to him to contain a concentrated operatic subject.

Agamemnon is a pathological tyrant who forces his people into the expedition against Troy. The very pacifistically disposed masses demand a sacrifice of him. He wishes to make the slaughtering of his son Orestes serve this purpose. Clytemnestra sends the child away secretly with an old nurse. Thereupon Agamemnon sacrifices Iphigenia as a substitute. Iphigenia disappears under the stroke of a hatchet.

In Leipzig this was done under blinding magnesium light. There is a question, however, whether a miracle can happen convincingly upon the opera stage which is the very negation of rite and myth. Yet Krenek wins us over in the next scene to the belief, if not in miracles, at least in spiritualism. Iphigenia appears to King Thoas, an astrological magician who has a capricious and rather under-domesticated daughter, although she sings the part of a little bird. She materializes in a moonbeam, though she lives afterward in the real flesh in Tauris.

Meanwhile Orestes gets to know life under the guidance of his faithful nurse, Anastasia, at the annual Athens fair, an ensemble which has much the outward appearance of a harbor scene at Marseilles or Naples, and presumably had much the same appearance then. The country lout among big city folk has a mishap. He demolishes the show-booth of a juggler in throwing a ball, appropriately a white one, a suitable token. Separated from his companion, he is to wander now for ten years through the land of Greece as artist or tramp, until, oppressed by homesickness (grand lyric episode between two touching scenes) he turns once again to Mycenae.

In the interim Agamemnon's destiny has been fulfilled. Setting foot within a comfortless home, he commits suicide rather than be murdered by Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, not indeed by the traditional hatchet-stroke—there would be altogether too much hatchet play—but by a draught of poison. Orestes, recognized and enlightened by Elektra, perpetrates the murder of Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, at once a murder and matricide, before the assembled people at the obsequies of Agamemnon. These obsequies bear rather a Polynesian or Sudanese than a Hellenic character.

WHAT sort of significance has a mother's curse in this scene, that the people trample Elektra to death and dance the Carmagnole? In the fourth act one is puzzled to see Orestes emerge in King Thoas's house as a perplexed wayfarer. One does not wonder that Thoas's little daughter, in a paroxysm of blood-lust, presses the hatchet into his hand and points to Iphigenia's head as the goal. One wonders, once more, that it never reaches that point. It would have been a better and wholly newer and more suitable conclusion. There follow episodes of guilty knowledge, a quartet, a sudden change to ethics and worship, wandering to the Athenian Areopagus.

The white and black ballots of the judges fall into equal halves for the expiation of the supplicating ones. The chief judge must cast the deciding ballot and refuses the terrible decision. Thereupon a child casts that white ball which still lies "ex voto" in the urn at the feet of the statue of Athena. The goddess has spoken. The casting of the ball of the owner of the shooting booth becomes an instrument of Providence. Conclusion, a dance and chorus of jubilation, two happy couples, Thaos and Iphigenia, and Orestes and the little daughter of King Thoas.

In place of a judgment on this choice of material and manner of fashioning it, let us give a citation: "Every archaeological experiment based on antique subject matter simply betrays once more that classical visionary bauble which has sealed from the pedantic and academic nineteenth century an insight into the cella of the afflatus of the antique spirit. Nevertheless, we poor folk born afterward ought not therefore to bring forward our little attempts to fly and our purely sensational movie stuff in place of the moving mystery play of antiquity."

The material of antiquity, of which Krenek is the usufructuary, has its style, its inherent law of creation. If one does not desire to fulfill it—though it can be fulfilled in ten different ways—one must keep his fingers away from it with all dexterity. Krenek has lived, seen, read so much. The conclusion of the first act with the limping harmonica player is the conclusion of a Schreker.

The scurrilous is mixed with cult-worship, the drama with the opera seria, the composer with the educated traveler. This "Orestes" is like an example of hybrid origins.

THIS music matches the text. The text has no race, that is to say, no style, though it is nearly always of the theatre. It goes forward continuously, dramatically and scenically. The music similarly has no style, but at least it has no time for perversions because of the abundance of the material. It is forced to make the experiment of close relation, since the action is so rapid, if not entirely convincing. The vocal parts predominate. The orchestra really accompanies, mostly sparingly, often in primitive fashion, especially in the involved "northern" scenes.

The voices and the chorus seek opportunity for ensemble. There are operatic contrasts — the sustained bass of Thoas, the coloratura of Thamar. There is naturalism, as in the entrance of the warriors into Mycenae with a vulgar street song; monologues which develop into arias, aria-like dialogues, abstract duets; end-changes which sound like operatic "exits" of Verdi.

Elektra's aria in the third act is a reminder of Richard Strauss's "Elektra." The finale is stylized in the manner of Gluck. The Tauris scenes of Iphigenia are almost as tedious as German post-Wagnerian opera. Only the anxiety just before the great moment prevents it from bordering almost on the comic. Thoas's vision of the "southland" remains a lamentable indication of an impression. The scene at the annual fair completely miscarries both in tempo and in compactness. Here musicality and work do not suffice to make the mad intoxication convincing. Old Flotow did much better in a similar situation. Convincing, however, are the lyric interpolation of Orestes's chief monologue, with the bucolic soaring flute and the accompanying banjo, the evening songs of the herdsmen. Convincing, also, is the scene of the home-coming of Agamemnon, which reads in the text like a familiar exposition of a proletarian kitchen. Here the melancholy of the return hits the mark musically. Here, also, an operatic scene with something of style comes into being, effective in the handling of the vocal parts, painted well and sparingly.

Here Krenek displays great talent. Here is no longer the husk of opera, but opera itself. It is a pity that this great talent which writes "grand opera" is virtually developing into a miniature Meyerbeer for want of more musical guiding principles.

EVENTS IN ENGLAND.

THE opportunities which are afforded the English composer may be seen from the announcement of the Liverpool Repertory Opera Company that first performances of the following works will be given this season: "Imogen's Choices," by Gervase Hughes; "The Moon Robbers," by Leigh Henry; "The Birth of the Sun God," by Ernest Lodge, and "The Shepherd's Lottery," by Boyce. The Promenade concerts are performing a like service for native symphony composers.

The Oxford University Press of London has just published "Beethoven's Sketches," translated from the original German of Dr. Paul Mies. The work traces the development of Beethoven's style from the inception of a theme until the finished work and is rich in illustration.

"I was brought up on a strict diet of Bach and Beethoven. I first listened with horrified incredulity to a few modern works. I found that the discords were by no means new. Gradually I became obsessed by the freedom of expression of the moderns. My erstwhile tolerance ripened into love. To me one page of full-blooded Bartok or Schonberg or Lobos is worth more than the aimless tricklings of Brahms, Weber, Mozart and Haydn. (Letter to The London Daily Telegraph).

DISCOVERING RARE BACH MANUSCRIPTS AND OTHER TREASURES

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My friend Manfred Gorke-Eisenach, one of the leading contemporary collectors of Bach manuscripts, often comes to my house for a cup of tea and a friendly chat. One of these visits occurred a few days ago. Suddenly he inquired: "Können sie Englisch?"

"Of course," I replied.

"Then will you translate this for me?" he said, handing me a copy of THE NEW YORK TIMES. It contained a long article which described in detail the discovery of the sonata in G major of Johann Sebastian Bach, hitherto unknown but without question authentic, which Herr Gorke had found in an old chest that had been in the possession of his family for nearly two centuries. Though its existence had been known to some members of the family, the fact had been kept secret until Manfred Gorke discovered the manuscript while rummaging around for family antiques. Thus the sonata was brought to light.

It is interesting to note that the great-grandfather of Manfred Gorke was "Kantor" at the time of the great Johann Sebastian, and that he was an ardent admirer of his famous contemporary and colleague. It was natural, therefore, that he should collect and preserve every bit of the latter's autograph music that fell into his hands. Doubtless he realized that the time would come when such manuscripts would be regarded as of the utmost value to the world.

Hidden away in the silence of the old family chest of the Gorkes, these priceless treasures were waiting to be recalled to life. Not only was the G major sonata which was performed at the last Bach festival in Leipzig, brought to light, but more than a hundred other pieces in Bach's handwriting and that of his sons and pupils, representing outstanding classics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In the opinion of competent critics the G major sonata is one of the finest and most carefully written of all Bach's works.

Among the other recently discovered manuscripts may be mentioned several by Johann Christian Bach, the so-called "London" Bach (1735-1782), including some sonatas "per il cembalo." One of them contains a charming menuet in the style of Mozart. Among other items are a suite and a concerto by J. S. Bach, the latter a manuscript of nearly 100 pages.

Another highly interesting volume contains autograph manuscripts of J. S. Bach and of his son Friedemann, both occasionally writing on the same page. It is about sixty pages long and is inscribed "Per il Cembalo Solo." Perhaps the older man, at that time nearly blind, dictated his inspirations to Friedemann; perhaps an order had to be delivered in haste; perhaps money was scarce. We all know that Johann Sebastian never amassed earthly goods, that some of his children went astray, and that his wife died in an asylum.

Melancholy thoughts arise when we behold these yellow, faded, venerable manuscripts, covered with notes in extremely neat writing, and telling stories of almost forgotten times.

One of Johann Sebastian's best pupils was the organist Ludwig Krebs (1713-1780). Several works of this composer were slumbering beside those of his great master.

Before long several of the newly discovered treasures will be disclosed to the world. The copies are photographic reproductions of the originals, which are kept in a safe deposit vault. From every part of Europe people are coming to Eisenach to examine these extremely interesting and unquestionably authentic manuscripts. Offers of purchase are made to Herr Gorke every day; but he is an idealist! He loves these pages and enjoys their possession. He cannot make up his mind to part with these beloved testimonials of a bygone age. Instead of selling, he goes on collecting, and soon his Bach collection will be the most extensive in the world.

Only a privileged few are considered worthy of the honor of looking at and handling these precious manuscripts. I was among those chosen friends, and I shall never forget the feeling of awe and veneration which overcame me when for the first time the covering, hand-painted in light colors, was removed and before my eyes lay the handwriting of our greatest master of music. Still more solemn and more thrilling was the moment when my fingers awakened to life music that for nearly three centuries had been slumbering in silence and oblivion.

Johann Sebastian Bach is not merely a name, he is an eternal inheritance for the whole world, and the plain, unpretentious house on the Frauenplan in Eisenach, at the foot of Luther's Wartburg, matches the most pompous and splendid castle. Here a king was born, a king in the kingdom of music.

ELLA VON CORNBERG.

Eisenach, Germany, Jan. 22, 1930.

Bethlehem Bach Singers — Cincinnati Festival Chorus—A Season's Novelties

© Mishkin.

Eleanor La Mance, Singing Thursday at Town Hall.

SPRING FESTIVALS.

At the beginning of the present rehearsal season of the Bethlehem Bach Choir, directed by J. Frederick Wolle, a questionnaire was handed to each singer to designate his ancestry, occupation, religious affiliation and age. Over 200 members of the choir gave the desired information.

The nationality proved cosmopolitan. Eighty-six were of pure German descent and the remainder were as follows: American, fifteen; English, eleven; French, eight; Welsh six; Scottish, two, and Austrian, Slovak and Norwegian, each one.

The commingling of racial bloods included, two, three and even four crossings of English, German, French, Swiss, Irish, Scottish, Czech and Dutch strains.

The list of occupations was almost as varied and comprised teachers, clerks, students, stenographers, engineers, musicians, secretaries, salesmen, bankers, business men, clergymen, dressmakers, accountants, textile workers and one each of the following: Buyer, confectioner, farmer, mechanic, architect, forester, printer, newspaper man, plumber, contract plasterer, auto dealer, garage man, auto inspector, draftsman, shoe worker, silk worker, electrician and a radio worker.

The religious affiliations were the Lutheran, Reformed, Moravian, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Roman Catholic, Evangelical and Mennonite.

The average age of the members was about 26, with seventeen persons below 20 and five over 60.

The members of the choir come from Allentown, Catasauqua, Bethlehem, Slatington, Hellertown, Easton, Bangor, Nazareth, Reading, Princeton, N. J.; Washington, D. C.; Buffalo, N. Y., and other cities. There are over 300 guarantors, one of whom resides in Paris, France. Each will be called upon to pay his share should there be a deficit.

The days chosen for the Bach Festival at Bethlehem are May 16 and 17. Several of Bach's cantatas, never given there before, will be sung on Friday afternoon and evening, May 16, and the Mass in B minor will be given in its entirety on Saturday, May 17. The soloists are to be announced shortly.

CINCINNATI'S CHORUS.

The Cincinnati Musical Festivals Chorus which went to Orchestra Hall, Chicago, on Feb. 6, 7 and 8 for concerts with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra has a history vying with that of most American organizations.

It was organized by Theodore Thomas in 1873 by combining separate singing bodies and was conducted by him until his death in 1905. In 1880 it became a permanent body. A chorus of children from the public schools has been a permanent feature in the festivals since 1906. Frederick Stock began his connection with it in 1896 as a member of the Festival Orchestra, later becoming associate and guest conductor, and is now the permanent director. Succeeding conductors included Frank van der Stucken, Ernest Kunwald and Eugene Ysaye. Sir Edward Elgar made his first public appearance in this country at the festivals.

Some of the works presented in America for the first time include Bach's Magnificat in D and Brahms's German "Requiem," which were also scheduled during its recent visit; Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," Ysaye's "Exil" and Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" and "The Apostles," which the composer conducted in person. National figures who have been associated with the Cincinnati May Festival include such names as William Howard Taft, Nicholas Longworth and Lawrence Maxwell.

The estimate in which the association is held is best illustrated by George P. Upton's statement, which said: "* * * The highest standard of musical perfection in this country. * * * The crowning achievement of Mr. Thomas's career." Grove's Dictionary of Music says: "The most notable of the recurring musical meetings in the United States."

CHAMBER MUSIC.

Nikolai Orloff, Naoum Blinder and Evsei Beloussoff will play a trio in C minor, Op. 38, at Alexander Gretchaninoff's concert of his own works next Saturday evening before the Russian Club of New York. Maria Kurenko will sing the composer's songs, and he himself will accompany Mr. Beloussoff in his 'cello sonata, Op. 113.

Sascha Jacobsen and the Musical Art Quartet will take part in the Voch celebration this evening at Mecca Temple, with other stage stars and a "folklore review."

Carlos Salzedo, the harpist, appears tonight with the New York Chamber Music Society in André Caplet's "Conte Fantastique" and tomorrow in harp duets with the Beethoven Association.

The Hart House String Quartet completes three concerts here this week, its second program tomorrow being from three modern composers, Delius, John Beach and Dohnanyi.

Georges Barrere, now celebrating twenty-five years in America, is to give three concerts with the Little Symphony at the Guild Theatre in March. For the first time since 1905 he played again in France last Fall.

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

By Italian training and association, the American violinist, Albert Spalding, is congenially engaged in four of the five concerts with which Bernardino Molinari in the next eight days completes his Philharmonic engagement. Mr. Spalding will be twice heard in Mozart's concerto and will assist at the midweek pair in the "Gregorian" concerto of Respighi.

Mr. Molinari, sailing for home Feb. 26 on the Hamburg, will resume his place as conductor at the Augusteum in Rome. He will also take his orchestra on a brief tour of Italian cities before returning on May 31 to America for a Summer engagement on the Pacific Coast.

Philharmonic-Symphony plans at last may be settled by vote of the board of directors, meeting next Thursday. A contract signed last Monday by the Columbia Broadcasting Company takes the local concerts "on the air" over a nationwide network next season. "Among the conductors expected to lead," says its announcement, "are Arturo Toscanini, Willem Mengelberg, Bernardino Molinari, Sir Thomas Beecham and others."

The Cleveland Orchestra and its conductor, Nikolai Sokoloff, are coming to town to assist in three performances at Mecca Temple next Thursday, Friday and Saturday, by the former Neighborhood Playhouse company of dancers and actors, assembled by the Misses Lewisohn in a program from C. M. Loeffler, Henri Rabaud and Werner Janssen.

The Conductorless Symphony Orchestra continues its interesting experiment of symphonic music played by musicians in mutual cooperation and understanding such as obtain in chamber music. A fourth subscription concert of the orchestra's second season next Friday presents Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Benno Rabinoff, and a novelty, Weiss's "American Life."

Led by Joseph E. Maddy, the National High School Orchestra comes out of the West to play Feb. 23 to 27 in Atlantic City and Philadelphia, Feb. 28 in New York and March 1 in Washington. Its program will include Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Liszt's E flat concerto, with Ernest Hutcheson, and Bloch's "America."

NOTES OF OPERA FOLK.

"Das Rheingold" next Friday afternoon starts the Metropolitan's month-long cycle of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen." The series of four matinees is officially announced, for the first time in over a quarter century, "in its entirety, without cuts."

"The Daughter of the Regiment," which the Little Theatre Opera group presents in English this week, was produced by Grau for Mme. Sembrich in 1901 and by Gatti in 1917 with Hempel. William Hinshaw gave it last in 1919 with Yvonne de Treville.

Lillian Gustafson, Madge Cowden, Louise Trolsaas, Louise Bernhardt, Oliver Stewart and Wellington Smith are in Charlotte Lund's cast for "Tales of Hoffmann" next Saturday at the Town Hall. Aleta Dore's ballet includes 6-year-old Jane Loew, a granddaughter both of Adolph Zukor and of the late Marcus Loew.

When "Parsifal" is sung on April 16 at a Metropolitan benefit for the Summer Schools for Women in Industry it will be the sixtieth performance of Wagner's final work in the twenty-two seasons of Gatti as director. Conried in five years gave twenty-five, his first season of eleven "Parsifals" still holding the house records, both for the box office and café.

CHORAL CONCERTS.

Ernest Bloch's "America," announced for broadcast from the Roxy Theatre studio last Sunday, has been postponed till next Sunday, Feb. 23, owing to the extended time necessary for rehearsals by the chorus under Max Herzberg and the orchestra under Joseph Littau.

More than 350 members of the People's Chorus will take part in a second "intimate singing entertainment" at the Town Hall on Feb. 27, under the direction of Lorenzo Camilieri.

The eighth annual Inter-Preparatory Glee Club contest will be held at the Town Hall on March 8. Three new schools entered are Horace Mann, of this city; the Hill School, Pottstown, Pa., and Tome School, Port Deposit, Md.

Twenty Canadian immigrant nationalities will take part in a Folksong and Handicraft Festival at Calgary, Alberta, March 19 to 22, in the third of the "Great West" festivals sponsored annually by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Following Bach's "St. John Passion" on March 9, the Friends of Music announce Brahms's "Parzengesang" for March 16, when Felix Salmond plays Elgar's 'cello concerto, and on March 30, Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas."

The Philadelphia Orchestra has postponed the last of its regular home series of concerts from April 22 to 23, in order to cooperate with the League of Composers in a New York performance of Stravinsky and Schönberg works at the Metropolitan Opera House on April 22

John Charles Thomas is re-announced in the title rôle of Verdi's "Rigoletto" with the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company on Feb. 20, others in the cast being Josephine Lucchese, Josephine Jirak, Josef Wolinski and Ivan Steschenko. Emil Mlynarski will conduct, and the opera will be staged by Wilhelm von Wymetal Jr.

MUSIC SUPERVISORS TO MEET

The second biennial meeting of the Music Supervisors National Conference is to be held in Chicago the week of March 24. Seven thousand school music supervisors from all parts of the United States are expected to attend the sessions, which are to be held in the Stevens Hotel.

"Amateur Music" will be the subject of the conference, according to a statement just issued. "Recent developments in music, like the radio, the vitaphone, &c., have introduced new elements into music teaching, among them the all but complete elimination of the incentive to music study as a vocational subject. The entire question will come before the supervisors for thorough discussion. It is pointed out that school youngsters write essays, stories and poetry in composition classes, not with the idea that even one in a hundred will make writing a profession, but with the thought that such creative writing experience will inspire the girls and boys with a greater desire to read the best authors. Similarly it is held that every child should learn music, not because it is going to bring a larger income, but because first-hand experience in singing, in playing and in hearing the best of music beautifully performed opens the ears and the minds of the pupil to the beauties of sound which make for a richer and more complete life.

Speakers at the conference will include, it is announced, Walter Damrosch, Edward Howard Griggs, John Erskine, Peter W. Dykema, William J. Bogan, superintendent of the Chicago public schools; Rudolph Ganz, Guy Maier, Percy A. Scholes of Montreaux, Switzerland; Helen Hay Heyl, Frantz Prochowski, Joseph N. Weber, president American Federation of Musicians; Dean G. L. Butler, Syracuse University, president of the American Association of Schools of Music; Mrs. Ruth Haller Ottaway, president of the National Federation of Music Clubs; Dean Charles H. Mills of the University of Wisconsin, and many other noted music education authorities and outstanding music supervisors.

Musical features of the week include a concert by the Paulist Choristers, a band demonstration by five champion school bands, an all-Chicago school chorus, a concert by the Flint (Mich.) a capella choir, two concerts by the National High School Orchestra, and one by the National High School Chorus, and a complimentary concert to the supervisors by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Frederick Stock. Many sectional meetings and a variety of demonstrations are also on the program to make the conference of the greatest practical value to the supervisors.

Philadelphia responded so enthusiastically to "Parsifal" by the Metropolitan stars last year that General Manager Gatti-Casazza has again announced the work there on April 15, conducted by Serafin.

Karl Lorenz, Leader of Chamber Music Guild.

The Manhattan Symphony Orchestra, Henry Hadley conducting, gives its eighth concert of the present season next Sunday evening at 9 P. M. with Anita Duncan as dance soloist.

MISS GOODSON'S RETURN.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who appeared with the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra in its concert last Sunday at Mecca Temple, made her reappearance in recital at Carnegie Hall in January after a long absence, her last visit to this country having been seven years ago.

An inaccuracy appeared in these columns in the report of Sunday's concert, at which Miss Goodson played the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven. It was not the English pianist, but Katharine Baker of New York who had played the complete Beethoven sonata cycle in observance of the composer's death centerary year.

THE DANCE: A NEW SYNTHESIS

The Neighborhood Playhouse's Coming Production Attacks Old Problem of Combining Music and Drama—Notes and Comment

By JOHN MARTIN.

THE Neighborhood Playhouse offers its annual production of "stage versions" of musical compositions on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of this week at the Mecca Auditorium, and once more the perennial discussion of theatrical synthesis takes a prominent place in the dance world. Whatever one may cherish as his own personal theory as to the solution of the esthetic problem involved, there can be only admiration for the courage and consistency of the Misses Lewisohn in their particular approach to the subject, and most of all for their recognition of the fact that the time has come to do something instead of to go on talking about it indefinitely.

The subject closely concerns the dance. Music and the drama of their own forms are well defined and established in the public mind; if they choose to expand, so much the better, but if they do not choose to do so, there are still inexhaustible resources for creative activity within their conventional boundaries. If they are to be united and merged in a new, or rather another, form, the kindly offices of the dance, which stands in a strategic relation to both of them, seem requisite.

Furthermore, if the dance is to exist in the public mind as something more than an appurtenance of revues and moving picture presentations, it must find a means of externalizing itself in some form that will be broader and more entertaining than the recital. There is ample reason to believe that when the synthetic theatre shall have been achieved, it will be less a creation of something new than a recreation of something old; as old, in fact, as the orchesis of the Greeks, which is the dance itself in its broadest sense.

It is certainly not easy to impress this concept of the dance on a public that has been trained to consider thirty-two fouettes as the height of any dancer's attainments. Even the modern recitalist is, in a way, presenting a parallel to the technical stunting of the old-fashioned technician. At his worst he is exhibiting his own brand of virtuosity in a composition built to show it off at its most brilliant point. At his best he is merely presenting a study for a larger work. But what is the larger work to be? It must contain music, costume, décor, emotional expression of some sort, as well as movement. Assuredly it is not the ballet d'action where pantomime and technique alternate against a musical background. That has worn itself out with convincing finality.

Isadora Duncan's Influence.

It is apparently impossible to discuss the development of the dance without turning to Isadora Duncan for an example of one sort or another. She began, as it were, a new cycle; her approach was as if there had never been a dance before. The aridity of stereotyped acrobatics, tawdry costumes, empty gesture and music made by the yard, might as well never have existed, except that their irksomeness stimulated the pursuit of a new ideal. Isadora beyond question found the living essence of the dance, but she did not speak the final word. Indeed, there can never be a final word. If she threw off countless shackles, she bound on at least a few others, the chief of which was a complete subservience to music.

Against this enslavement, a new band of liberators arose, and we find ourselves now occasionally dancing in silence and thinking little or nothing of it. This again is not the final word. Already its own advocates are softening in their relentless abhorrence of musical dancing. It is nevertheless an important step, for the dance must find itself before it can be of any value, just as the various chemical elements must be isolated before they can be utilized.

One by one we have taken up phases and elements of the dance and analyzed them. The tendencies of the time have been largely of a scientific and inquiring turn, and have led to specialization and hence to a sort of disintegration. Our factories have developed the system of confining most workers to one specific function, and the results have been termed highly satisfactory. The same system has somehow fastened itself upon the arts of the theatre, in spite of the crying in the wilderness of Gordon Craig and a few others. Things came to such a pass that dancers were actually engaged not because they could dance, for they frequently could not, but because they could do splits or cartwheels or entrechats six or thirty-two fouettes. In all of this high-pressure efficiency development, it would be unreasonable to expect the appearance of any well-rounded, richly endowed talent capable of creating in the full terms of a master. The best to be hoped for logically would be some one who could assemble what he found into an operative whole.

The Work of Diaghileff.

As the years pass, Serge Diaghileff will undoubtedly stand out in greater and greater dimensions against the background of his time. A musician, a painter, a poet, an actor, a choreographer, in spite of the fact that he did not produce in the conventional mediums of these artists, he came at least as near to the achievement of a synthetic theatre as any since the days of antiquity. Then it was a natural manifestation growing out of the all-pervading emotionalism of a ritualistic religion; now it must be created consciously and, in a sense, scientifically.

One does not need to have one's ear to the ground to detect the approach of prophets. What will come out of their visionings remains to be seen, for there is no second Diaghileff in sight. Nevertheless, the Neighborhood Playhouse in its present incarnation as the producer of orchestral dramas, performances with stage and orchestra, or what you will, definitely dates the adventure.

In spite of the temporary lull in Sunday recitals, there is no sign of discouragement in the concert programs of the immediate future. Next Sunday will find no less than three dance events scheduled. In these uncertain days, however, it is difficult to be sure until the curtain is up.

At the Guild Theatre Sara Mildred Strauss and her group will make their first appearance in two seasons. The program this year will be like that of two seasons ago in that it will be one long composition rather than an assortment of short ones. It will be different in one very important respect, however. Whereas the former program was inclined to be a literary concept, this will be entirely abstract, built upon movement themes instead of "ideas." Miss Strauss calls her composition "studies for a dance symphony." The finished symphony will require fifty dancers and she is unable to do more at this time than present the project. There will be no music, no scenery and no costuming in the accepted sense. It is possible, therefore, that the performance will not come under the regulation of the Sunday law.

Also on Sunday evening Nimura, the Japanese dancer who has danced here only in the first of the Neighborhood Playhouse presentations at the Manhattan Opera House, will make his concert début at the New Yorker Theatre (formerly the Gallo). The performance was originally for the following week at the John Golden, but has been shifted to the earlier date. Pauline Koner, who appeared with Michio Ito, will be his fellow-artist.

The same evening, Anita of the Elizabeth Duncan school will dance with the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra at the Mecca Auditorium.

This afternoon the Dancers Club will be formally opened with a reception. This is the organization recently formed under the directorship of Margaret Severn to provide a club, living quarters, practice rooms and other necessaries for dancers and students. The club is situated at 347 West Fifty-sixth Street.

Martha Graham, who is an extremely busy person these days, will appear with her group tonight at the Mecca Auditorium in the "Voch" celebration. On the same program will be Jacob Ben-Ami, Maurice Schwartz, Sascha Jacobson and Joseph Buloff's group in a "folklore review." Miss Graham is also to give a concert as one of the series of People's Symphony concerts at the Washington Irving High School on April 11. She will also appear as a leading dancer in the Neighborhood Playhouse production and later in the League of Composers' presentation of "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Dorsha also will present a program of "pantomimic interpretations" in the People's Symphony series, on March 7.

Harald Kreutzberg and Yvonne Georgi will give a farewell recital at the Mecca Auditorium on Feb. 28. They are to sail for Germany the following day.

Doris Humphrey and Charles Weidman and their group will give a concert in Boston at the Boston Opera House on March 7.

Elsa Findlay's Ensemble will make its first appearance of the season at the Brooklyn Little Theatre on Feb. 27, and will dance at the McMillin Theatre of Columbia University on March 8.

Desha and her new dancing partner, Anthony Sansone, are featured dancers in "Pearls," the stage show at the Capitol this week. Desha has been well known hereabouts for several years, and Mr. Sansone was formerly a member of Gavriloff's Ballet Moderne.

Von Grona and his group are again to be seen at the Roxy this week, presenting a modern interpretation of Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody. Mr. von Grona appeared at the Roxy with great success last year.

The theatres present more than the usual promise for dance enthusiasts in the immediate future. Certainly not the least of the season's events is the appearance of Mei Lan-fang and his company of actors, dancers and musicians at the Forty-ninth Street Theatre. It is difficult to classify performances in the Chinese theatre as either drama or dance, for the Orient has apparently achieved a theatrical synthesis which the Western World has yet to discover.

Of quite different interest is the list of dancers who grace the cast of the forthcoming "International Revue" at the Majestic Theatre. Anton Dolin, one of the chief dancers of the Diaghileff ballet; the Spanish singer and dancer, La Argentinita, of whom much has been heard; and Moss and Fontana, who need no introduction, are among those present.

ORCHESTRA NOTES AFIELD

THE Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Fritz Reiner, in common with other major organizations in this country, has introduced an unusually large quota of scores to the frequenters of its concerts for the first half of the regular season.

Compositions which were heard in Cincinnati "for the first time anywhere" include Vittorio Gui's orchestrations of J. S. Bach's chorales: "O Mensch, bewein dein Sünde Gross" and "In dir ist Freude"; Hindemith's "Concerto for Wind Instruments"; Frederick the Great's Third symphony; Malipiero's "Impressioni dal vero," and the Bach-Schönberg "Prelude and Fugue in E flat."

Music introduced to local audiences included Respighi's "Feste Romane," Tchaikovsky's Second symphony, Bloch's suite for viola and orchestra with the assistant conductor of the orchestra, Bakaleinikoff as soloist, Busoni's orchestral suite from the music to Gozzi's fairy play "Turandot," Mozart's A major symphony, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Debussy's "Danses" for harp and strings, with Grandjany as soloist.

Barlow's "Alba" was to be given its world première on Jan. 31 and Feb. 1.

Bernardino Molinari, as guest conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, brought with him Vivaldi's "L'Inverno" from "The Four Seasons" and Corelli's "Suite for String Orchestra" during January. Victor Kolar, the associate conductor of the orchestra, was to introduce there Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carrier" shortly after, and Carpenter's "Krazy Cat" on Jan. 30 and 31.

St. Louis heard on Jan. 3 Mme. Molinari sing three arias with orchestra for the first time there. They were the aria from Scarlatti's opera "Sedecia, King of Jerusalem," Scarlatti's "Violette" arranged with string orchestra by Bernadino Molinari, and Franck's "Nocturne."

George Szell, general musical director of the Prague Opera, conducted the first St. Louis hearing of Hindemith's concerto for orchestra on Jan. 24.

Halffter's Sinfonietta in D was brought to Cleveland by Fernandez Arbos early in January. Serge Prokofieff played there his own First piano concerto in D flat, Op. 10, and his suite "Le Pas d'Acier," Op. 41. Stanford's "Irish Rhapsody," No. 1, Op. 78, Rudolph Ringwall conducting, was also presented to local audiences.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had three composer-conductors as its guests within the fortnight of Jan. 17-Jan. 31: Alexander Glazunoff in his sixth symphony, his symphonic poem "Stenka Razin" and his violin concerto with Benno Rabinoff as soloist; Eugene Goossens, who had introduced his own "Concerto for Double String Orchestra," the following week and Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his new piano concerto.

Eighty instrumentalists, under Rudolph Schueller, form the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C. The organizers are considering whether afternoon concerts from 4:30 to 6 are not the best, since these hours will conflict neither with the working schedule of the government employes nor with the social arrangements of political and diplomatic officials and their families. The prospectus notes that Washington is one of the few national world capitals without its symphony. Three Spring concerts are planned.

The Chicago Women's Symphony Orchestra recently had as its guest Gena Branscombe, who appeared as pianist-composer-conductor. The first half of the program comprised her cantata for women's voices and chamber orchestra, "The Dancer of Fjaard"; the trio "On Over the Water" from the choral drama "Pilgrims of Destiny," with the baritone solo "Comrades, Friends, Beloved" and the symphonic suite for orchestra and tenor "Quebec," the last in three sections.

Sir George Henschel is said to have been invited by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchstra to conduct some time during its fiftieth anniversary. "It would be indeed a fitting climax to a very long and honorable musical career," says The London Daily Telegraph of recent date, "if Sir George Henschel, now on the point of celebrating his eightieth birthday, were to accept the invitation of the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct at their jubilee concerts. For be it remembered that Sir George was actually their first conductor."

The first concert occurred on Oct. 22, 1881.

At the twenty-fifth anniversary memorial concert to Theodore Thomas on Jan. 3 the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under Frederick Stock, played the conductor's transcription for modern orchestra of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue. This was the first public performance. The new version is dedicated to the memory of the late Horace S. Oakley, who served as trustee for twelve years and as a vice president for ten of the Chicago Orchestral Association. Mr. Oakley died at sea on Dec 15. Beethoven's "Marcia Funebre" from the Third symphony was also played in memory of Mr. Oakley.

Beethoven's Seventh symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben" completed the program.

The works chosen for performance were among the favorites of Theodore Thomas.

SILK TAKES THE LEAD IN SPRING FASHIONS

FROCKS IN CASUAL MOOD

Scarfs, Boleros and Tuck-Ins Characterize The Informal Daytime Costume

FEW indeed are the women with sufficient will power to go through the dull days of February without at least one new frock which speaks of Spring. There are so many delightful new models, in black or navy, in bright colors or gay prints, that the choice is fairly bewildering. Somehow these new dresses have found the art of combining the feminine mode with a decided feeling of youth and freshness which makes them fairly irresistible. And, since fashions seem to have arrived at a fair degree of stability, the dress chosen now will be just as smart for late Spring and Summer wear without a coat.

Sleeves, skirts and lingerie touches are interesting features of the early Spring dresses. Skirts for the less formal type of costumes seem to have halted about thirteen inches from the floor—a very becoming length to the average woman. Dripping draperies have given way to the even hemline—for which we are all grateful. This is varied with a slight dip at the back in some of the new frocks which feature back fullness in godets or pleats—a trick that gives a new and decidedly chic swing to the silhouette, and which is illustrated in the printed dress sketched.

Sleeves take all sorts of liberties. They may be mere caps or epaulets, they may be just above the elbow, or three-quarters length with a flared lower section or long and tight and buttoned trimly at the wrist. Lanvin is doing interesting things with sleeves, introducing contrasting color in wide puffs below the elbow, or in exaggerated flaring cuffs.

Patou's "Rose Opaline"

THE lingerie touch seems finally to have reached the peak of its vogue, and is introduced in all sorts of ways on all sorts of costumes. Colored lingerie is very new. Patou uses his new "rose opaline shade" for collars, cuffs and vestees on Spring dresses of black or navy flat crêpe, or wool tissue. The printed dress sketched, which is a black jacquard weave in ivory and rose, has a youthful frilled collar and cuffs of hand-embroidered batiste in rose pink.

Another dress of Quaker-like charm is of pale gray flat crêpe. It has a round yoke and unusual circular cuffs made of innumerable ruffles of sheer white net. The effect is both demure and becoming. Exquisite convent embroidery on batiste is used for the deep scalloped yoke, in vest effect, which appears on a striking afternoon frock of black and white, in leaf design. This dress, which is quite formal, has three-quarters sleeves, a circular skirt longer in the back, and was shown with black suède sixteen-button gloves and a wide-brimmed hat of black Panamalaque.

Lace and batiste are combined in another charming frock of black canton crêpe for the matron. This frock has a circular skirt, mounted on a yoke, which is draped and tied at one side. The sleeves are three-quarter length and are finished with a circular flare. A pointed yoke of sheer embroidered batiste combined with lace adds a most becoming feature.

Tuck-ins Are Youthful

THE tuck-in blouse continues to appeal to the young girl and the woman of slender figure, for it is indubitably chic. Chosen for sketching is a two-piece dress of black flat crêpe, with tuck-in blouse and skirt buttoned on the hips and tied in front. The narrow revers and long, tight sleeves of this frock are finished with lacing of the material, which is also employed in openwork ladder-effect on the front of the blouse and skirt. Fine detail of this sort is a distinguishing feature of many of the new French frocks.

Navy blue ranks next to black in fashion interest at the moment. Marcelle Dormoy, for many years with Vionnet, has made a charming informal Spring daytime frock of navy blue flat crêpe, which is sketched on this page. Decidedly reminiscent of Vionnet is the ingenious arrangement of the scarf, which tucks through a slit in the bodice, and the buttoned diagonal closing of the blouse, which is repeated in the skirt.

COSTUME JEWELRY GROWS BOLDER

Prystal, in Pastels or Bright Colors, Featured at Openings in Wide Cuff Bracelets

A WIDE cuff-like bracelet of prystal is the latest addition to the smart woman's jewel collection. Bigger and better costume jewelry seems to be the order of the day. Many bold and striking designs in necklaces and bracelets were featured at the recent Paris openings, and prystal lends itself admirably to these because of its extreme lightness.

Pastels and vivid tints in prystal have succeeded the black and white effects first featured by Molyneux. Schiaparelli showed wide ruff bracelets in color with many of her sports ensembles, and Patou matches a wide wristband of pastel prystal and a shimmering necklace.

All black in dress, which has carried on from the town season to the Riviera and our own Southern resorts, is smartly pointed up with the new jet jewelry, which is once more at the height of fashion. Necklaces, pins and bracelets of brilliant jet are cut like precious stones. Decidedly reminiscent of the gay '90s is a wide collar of jet rosettes and cuff-like bracelets to match.

Just as many of the black frocks in the last openings showed effective touches of color, so Paris is combining jet with turquoise, jade, coral and aquamarine. Jet and crystal carries out the black-and-white theme in one of the new half length necklaces and bracelets. Crystal and jet necklaces and bracelets with several of her afternoon and evening frocks, while Vionnet, launching coral as a Spring costume color, also showed much effective coral jewelry.

White jewelry is still considered exceedingly chic with the white evening frock, which means that crystal, white prystal, strass and pearls with baguette crystal clasps and stations are much seen. Necklaces grow steadily more imposing, heavy link chains of rhinestones and baguettes vying with garland designs of prystal, glass or crystal, which may be draped front or back. Pearl necklaces may have as many strands as the purse allows or one's individual taste dictates.

Jeweled clips seem to be finding more and more uses. They adorn the purse, the glove, the hat or the shoulder strap of an evening frock and may be had in baguette crystals and rhinestones or the more colorful gallicra designs, with carved emeralds, rubies and sapphires.

PALM BEACH GOES IN FOR WHITE

Sun Tan No Longer Considered Compulsory by the Smartest Women at Southern Resorts

PALM BEACH, Fla.

THE sailfish that speared the fishing boat and then got away is just one of the excitements of the season down here. As we approach the climax of the Washington's Birthday regatta, interest in all the varied attractions of this beautiful place is intensified. Time seems to go too quickly for all the delightful things that can be done and—a very important part of it—for all the delightful clothes that can be worn.

Each year one goes through the same experience about Palm Beach clothes—the careful selection at home, under gray skies that make the palest pastels look daring; the arrival at Palm Beach and the two or three days' "try-out" of the new wardrobe, with probably a slight feeling of doubt and hesitation. Then the decision that, good as it is, it needs a few highlights. Then the joy of shopping in these fascinating shops for the brilliant frocks which the tropical setting demands.

Colors for the season so far rank as follows: White is easily a leader, and serves to enhance by contrast the brilliance of the colors. Blue, of the ciel or the periwinkle order, is probably next. The periwinkle blue, by the way, is the color Lelong has been showing at his Spring opening in Paris. Turquoise is worn, with delectable contrast in accessories. The dusty pink that is often seen with turquoise is also used for complete ensembles. Light, clear greens are quite usual. Red and white is a popular combination, and yellow is still in the picture, although not quite as important as last year. The gilt yellow, however—a strong tone that is almost a pumpkin shade—is worn by a few extremely chic women for afternoon and evening.

Prints in Profusion

PRINTS have appeared beyond all expectations. They are as good for daytime as for evening, and as attractive in crêpe as in chiffon. The lovely, widely spaced floral designs are used for the formal gown. At a recent luncheon on Sunday a fair-haired woman of indubitable smartness wore orchid and yellow chiffon with a design of large tulips. At the Colony Club on a Saturday evening a young woman whose elegant slenderness attracted much attention wore a baby blue crêpe gown with a pattern of spaced leaves. On the promenade at the Casino on a Sunday morning two well-known women wore red and white prints, one in a polka dot pattern and the other having a larger design of flowers and white birds.

"Sun-tan" is a subject on which to reserve one's opinion at the moment. Apparently, however, one may take it or leave it. Those visitors whose skin tans naturally and charmingly continue to affect what is, for them, hardly an affectation. At a well-known restaurant the other day at luncheon one very chic young woman wore a yellow sports frock with a low back. She stood for several moments with her back to the patio, and all eyes were turned to do justice to the charming quality of deep tan on her shoulders and arms. She wore a short necklace of carved crystal and amber, and the effect was beautiful.

Most women, however, are protecting their faces if not their arms, and stockings are light tan in tone. Only among the less discriminating does one see any of the coppery colors of last season. For evening, too, the colors in hosiery are delicate—most often the skin tones with a faint opalescent cast.

For Tropical Nights

EVENING gowns, by the way, at the Embassy and the Colony leave one almost wordless, so lovely are they. If you have doubted for a moment the charm of the skirts that sweep the floor, one glimpse of the slender swaying figure in the fairy light of these tropical gardens would convince you. Chiffon and georgette, in lovely tones of blue, turquoise and pink, move in and out between white and ivory satins and laces, against a background of a few striking black crêpe gowns. Flowered chiffons need only the setting of the palms and hibiscus to justify their existence.

THE FABRIC HAT

Taffeta Turbans the Latest In Spring Headgear

NOW it is taffeta hats! We have had linen hats, tweed hats and hats of Shantung, but taffeta is the latest fabric to be employed by the French creators of millinery fashions. And very successful it is, for taffeta is at once soft and crisp, and lends itself admirably to the drapings and flares that are so important in the modern hat mode.

One of the hats sketched on this page is the turban which was featured by O'Rossen with many of the suits shown at his recent Paris opening, and which caused quite a furor. It was made by Marguerite Paraf, of black taffeta embroidered all over with tiny white blossoms, and draped over a bandeau of bright red grosgrain ribbon, which ties in a bow over one eye. The effect is decidedly dashing when worn with one of the new Spring tailleurs, in black, black-and-white or oxford gray.

The saucy little cap of taffeta, worn well back on the forehead, is a creation of Maria Guy. Four pointed sections of the silk make the cap, the two back sections being continued in winglike draperies at the side, which may be adjusted at the angle most becoming to the wearer. In dark blue this hat is very smart with the navy frock or suit which plays such an important rôle this season.

Quilted taffeta in beige, green or blue is effective for the simple brimmed hat on sports lines, and is also shown in matching cravat scarfs. These stitched silk sports hats have proved very popular at Palm Beach, where they have been worn in bright colors to contrast with white frocks, or in soft pastels which exactly match the suit or dress.

A New Tweed Turban

WHILE on fabric hats, a word must be said about Florence Walton's new tweed turban, which has had a great success. It is made of loosely woven tweed, in soft beige coloring, and is cleverly draped to hug the forehead, avoiding the bulky effect of some of the earlier tweed hats. A flat feather ornament in beige and brown gives a finishing touch of chic.

The brimmed hat, of flexible straw, is much in favor for the early Spring frocks of plain or printed silk. One of the new poke shapes from Mado is chosen for illustration. This hat is of baku sol—a silky baku with a high lustre—and is decidedly youthful in effect. The brim is shallow in the front, to reveal the forehead, and is pleated to fit snugly at the sides. Two stiff little quills of white are used for ornament.

The Tuck-in Blouse Gives a Youthful Air to This Street Frock of Black Flat Crepe. Tuck-ins Were Much Emphasized in the Recent Paris Openings. Strips of the Material Lace the Collar and Are Used in Ladder-Like Inserts.

PARIS STRESSES FEMININE TREND

Frilly Lingerie Blouses Are Shown by O'Rossen Even With His Strictly Tailored Suits

PARIS.

THE "whence, why, whither?" of the 1930 mode have been answered. The recent showings have confirmed the feminine revival, with more moderation, however, than governed its first appearance. The waist line remains high, if not higher, but its severity is mitigated by draperies and boleros. Skirt levels follow a sliding scale, but the daytime hem never rises above five inches below the knees, and the evening length usually stops short of the floor.

Wraps of all kinds are growing shorter. There are legions of boleros and little capes, both detached and detachable. Some of these are abbreviated until they resemble the fichus and circulars of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. There are few real coats except with tailored suits or as part of sports ensemble. Generally coats masquerade as capes, and hiplength capes have slits and buttons that give them the air of coats. Sleeves, too, are growing shorter. Many of them are reduced to little puffs, frills or capelets.

Tailored and semi-tailored suits promise to have a great vogue this Spring. That makes O'Rossen's collection particularly significant. His subtle treatment of seams, which he often makes to resemble patterned encrustations, is little short of marvelous. He cuts even his most classic tailored costumes so as to contradict any suggestion of masculinity.

O'Rossen this Spring is launching silk suits both for morning and for formal afternoon wear. The former are of mixed silks woven into a tweed surface, or of silk poplin. Heavy black crêpe, either plain or relieved by white pin dots, makes the latter, which have seven-eighths coats, belted, or cut on princess lines in a high-waisted, almost empire silhouette.

New Shades in Hose

WOOL suits have smooth surfaces and small-weave patterns. Loose wooly tweeds are here reserved for top coats. Favorite colors are nut beige, doe-brown, navy, stone blue, violet-gray, gray in tweeds and black and white. Manekins wear dark stockings, exactly matching, or one shade lighter than the gray, stone blue or beige costumes.

O'Rossen sponsors frilly inside blouses of all-over lace, lace-trimmed georgette or dotted silk muslins, even with his strictly tailored costumes. Printed crêpe tunic blouses in bright colors accompany some of his plain-colored silk suits.

Marthe and Renée are a young house that has many new ideas. They are specially good in making wearable and pretty costumes for young girls. They show daytime ensembles and simple evening frocks. There are no really formal clothes.

Waist Lines Go Higher

THE waist line here is above rather than below normal. Suits have long gored coats, or short almost bolero jackets. In fact, they have unusually diverting boleros. A black one worn over a long sleeved printed afternoon frock, has new three-quarter sleeves. Skirt fullness is confined to the mid-thigh by long tight hip yokes or by stitched pleats. Little round or split capelets accompany crêpe frocks. There are a number of variations of the new short sleeves. Favorite colors are navy, pastels, of which pale green and pale yellow come first, the new mauves, pink and gray.

Chantal's 1930 Spring program is a guide to what the well-dressed woman should wear from the time she jumps out of bed in the morning until she sinks into it again at night. Costumes are strictly divided according to the time of day and the formality of the occasion for which they are intended. For rising, layers of robes or feminine pajamas; real sport in all its branches, tweeds, woolens, jerseys; spectator sports, print frocks and long wool coats; week-end, ensembles with good practical long coats and one or two frocks of silk or jersey, related to the coat only by a belt of the same material, as well as the matching skirt, separate blouse and amusing scarf; in town, little jacket suits of green, brown or navy, with wraparound skirts and white silk or satin inside blouses; morning, frocks of plain navy blue wool or spotted foulard; luncheon at a fashionable restaurant, slightly more formal dark suits, or draped frock and coat ensembles all of black crêpe.

The very formal afternoon bridge parties call for ensembles of georgette and lace, with long coats to match or of a heavier material. To the cocktail party one wears printed chiffon, with a little cape and a large straw cloche.

NOW THE SILHOUETTE'S THE THING

Recent Openings Emphasize the Need for Perfect Foundation Garments With the New Frocks

RECENT happenings in Paris have established beyond the shadow of a doubt the fact that the feminine figure is with us to stay, and it looks as though the last die-hard would soon join the quest for the lost waist line. Model after model from the leading couturiers stressed lines which revealed the contours of the figure, snugly fitted bodices, high or natural waist lines, and smooth molded hips. Whether the dress was for sports, daytime, afternoon or evening, the silhouette story was the same. The slim curves of the adolescent figure are decidedly the thing.

Reports from the openings indicate that the favored corset in Paris is a supple girdle of silk, unboned, cut a little higher to indicate the curve of the waist line, and long enough to mold the hips. These girdles give the effect of an uncorseted figure while providing the necessary restraint for the new frocks.

The new Spring foundation garments, whether girdles or all-in-ones, are being made in crêpe de chine, satin and taffeta, with panels of handwoven elastic. Some are plain, others embroidered and elaborately lace trimmed, but all are soft and supple as lingerie. Faille is a new material which is proving practical, for it is firm enough to mold the figure without boning. Flesh color is preferred, although ivory, peach and other tints which match lingerie are shown.

For the woman who wishes to do some drastic reducing there is a semi-step-in of satin, with the sides all of elastic, while another also of satin with a wide front panel of elastic, has two short bones slipped under a stitched strap of the satin. The closing is with hooks and eyes at one side. This type of garment is for the figure which requires support of the diaphragm, but the bones are short and supple and do not interfere with comfort.

The Laced Girdle

LACINGS have reappeared. A girdle of pink satin has front lacings to within a few inches of the bottom, which may be adjusted to the individual figure to secure perfect fit.

An ideal all-in-one garment of delicate pink faille for a slender figure suggests grace and ease itself, with welt seams following the contours of the figure and narrow panels of elastic at the side. This garment fastens at the back and is boneless.

ARTHUR B. DAVIES MEMORIAL—OTHER EXHIBITIONS

MEMORIES AND IMAGES

Art in Which the Past Persists Although Transmuted Into Purely Personal Visions

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY.

ARTHUR DAVIES was Welsh, and to his origin must be traced the charm, the strength and the failings of his art. In the memorial exhibition of his works now open at the Metropolitan Museum we see him plain. An exhibition so just and true in its dealings with the public warrants and should receive the highest praise from all who value the chance of breathing the whole atmosphere of an artist's life work, not merely the stimulating air of the highest reaches.

Here is the sketch for a court room decoration which was not used. If the jury or committee declined it, they probably made a mistake, for certainly its originality of design and the beauty of its color place it far above the average level of such decoration; but for a Davies performance it can only be considered a failure, since it lacks that freedom and blithe movement which are the very essence of his personal gift. Not a vestige of it to be seen.

On the other hand, we have the "Italian Landscape," through which white oxen lumber slowly and which soars to the clouds in films of pallid color to drop lightly down the hillside with accents of black, both strong and bland—a black the secret of which is known only to painters whose color sense is seven times refined. We have also the beautiful early "Idyl of the Harlem," or "Twilight on the Harlem"—any of the various titles that have been attached to it—the strong supports and measured openings of the bridge under a sky of deep and subtle blue in which a white moon is at the full and white stars burn incandescently, trees below and little figures in the foreground, stately dogs attending a woman seated on the ground, a small white dog running in the van of running children; each living creature particularized and each and all subordinated to the universality of the natural world. A painting that expresses as much of the essential Davies as anything that came later.

OTHER early pictures are "The Throne," a delightful interpretation of the sovereign quality of babyhood, quite without the sentimentality that too easily gushes fourth when that source of human feeling is probed; "At Her Toilet," all compact of the touching frailty and loveliness of a half-grown girl's physical structure, gently curving from shoulder to hip as she bends over at the business of washing her firm young flesh, her face in shadow, her hair a mist of darkness against a light wall; the composition a fine interplay of angles and curves, the color chiefly a matter of sensitively felt, closely related values, with an occasional clear note of blue; "Sleep Lies Perfect on Them," another poignant achievement, simple in spite of much detail, and without the symbolic gesture that later often intrudes. Simplest of all these early ones is the painting of two children and a lamb, each in its way a singularly successful embodiment of pure innocence incapable of guile or intelligent righteousness; the title is "Little Lamb" and Blake's poem hardly could have been more intelligibly illustrated. It was a pity, though, not to keep in the catalogue list the longer title, "Little Lamb, Who Made Thee," which was used by Davies and is the first line of the poem.

It is not the so-called Italian influence or the influence from Flanders, rich in wholesome charm of flesh, that make so attractive the early work of Davies; it is not the now disdained sfumato, blending forms with shadowy backgrounds and dissolving outline in favor of soft thickness; it is not even the deep, warm gold and red of Venetian coloring that capture a fancy trained to discount such appeal to the senses. It is the instinctive naturalness of his interpretations. External symbolism has not yet been applied to the design. An intuitive sense of natural fitness to the theme dignifies pose and gesture, and these simple expressions with their emotional vibrations frequently are more memorable than the complex harmonies, the clearer utterance, the livelier color of the later years.

IT would, however, be the crudest of errors to underestimate the fullness of Davies's ripened gift. As one glances about the walls (upon which by this time the pictures are hung and along the base of which they were clustered at the time of reviewing them) there is evidence and to spare of a personal vision not merely rare but unique. No one in this day or any former day has given us quite what this lean, muscular poet, his mind filled with the memory of Welsh music, gave us; a worker, a dreamer, a thinker, up to the day of his death in the solitude of the Italian mountains.

What, then, did he give us as life ran fuller with him, and carried him away from the simplicity of his little lambs and dancing children? Chiefly, perhaps, a light from his steadily burning torch, certainly the greatest gift of those that pass from one to another. Among the later pictures are found a few that hold us by their triumphant energy. These reaffirm Blake's splendid affirmation: "Energy is eternal delight." One of the "Wild He-Goats' Dance"—a solemn ritual of irresistible gayety. The creatures revolve on their hind legs, each goat face charged with expression, each expression different from the others; uncouth movement against a crazy-quilt background; children somewhere also dancing. Whether Davies saw this in reality or in a vision, it thrilled lustily through his being, and he made a loud and cheerful song about it in paint. He was happy with animals. A painting called "The Willow" is mostly about sheep, silly sheep in a curved row, the texture of their woolly coats indicated with unusual precision. "Bacchante Spring" has a foreground along which stretch pigs. Pigs that seem at a casual glance to be brown rocks, but unroll themselves gradually to the view as authentic sty-dwellers. Mr. Babbott's "Chalice" owes most of its persuasive beauty to the swans.

He was happy with landscape. When he was young in his profession his best work was that dedicated to children, animals and landscape, and in his latest years he returned to pure landscape. Mr. Burroughs, commenting upon this return, says in his preface to the exhibition catalogue: "These landscapes, though founded on views of particular places, are entirely ideal and romantic in their expression. He made over the landscape before him, changing it into the landscape of his imagination where dryads might wander or unicorns graze. The latter was his reality—the other its simulacrum. With an arbitrariness which is like his youthful intuition he eliminated from the landscape before him such details of form and color as might frustrate his artistic impulse. A sense of tranquillity and repose pervades these last pictures. The artist had passed through his storms of curiosity and intellectual strivings, one would say, and settled down at last with contentment in his own natural home."

UNFAMILIAR with the particular places thus made over and "changed into the landscape of his imagination," it is, of course, quite impossible to deny or agree with Mr. Burroughs's analysis, but the fact that Mr. Burroughs himself is a painter into whose idyllic regions Greek personages habitually stray adds to the probability that he has read Davies aright. And yet in the presence of the exhibited works a sense of curiously exact reality enters the mind of at least one visitor. The mountain pictures of the past few years, the water colors made at Florence, Fiesole, the Apuan hills, the most romantic of the themes innocent of human habitation, communicate the impression of something already known to the observer, the reality of which would have been impaired by fuller detail. In fact, the older Davies grew and the more practiced in "seeing whole," the more significant use he made of freedom from detail. His ideal landscape seems to be one upon which the grace of an obliterating light has descended. The writer saw white oxen once wandering along a road between green fields, and though the setting was Flanders, not Italy, the remembered vision, molten by late sunlight, has since been a touchstone for Davies's transcendent realism in this kind. Using this touchstone there is no escaping the conviction that he painted exactly what he saw, that he "wrote it down" in paint, throwing out the words that would weigh too heavily upon its evanescent beauty, using only the words—few in number—that would yield the truest expression.

So much, and quite enough, for the landscapes—it is far more enlightening to see them than to read about them. As for the figures, one sad word must in honesty be said. Under the influence of theory, that sinister guest of active minds, repetition of gesture and pose dominates a great number of his figures after the intuitive phase of his youth has left him and he has become a master of method. These gestures, these poses, are foreign to commonplace thought, and especially foreign, we suspect, to such minds as have been saturated in ancient art and ancient literature wherein even mighty gods and goddesses act with supreme naturalness. And what is foreign, we all know, is unwelcome until it is understood. Therefore we record our shrinking from the unnaturalness, the hieratic significance, of this element in the paintings. It passes into the record of our own insensitiveness; nevertheless, it should be mentioned, if only to stir some more sensitive visitor to refutation.

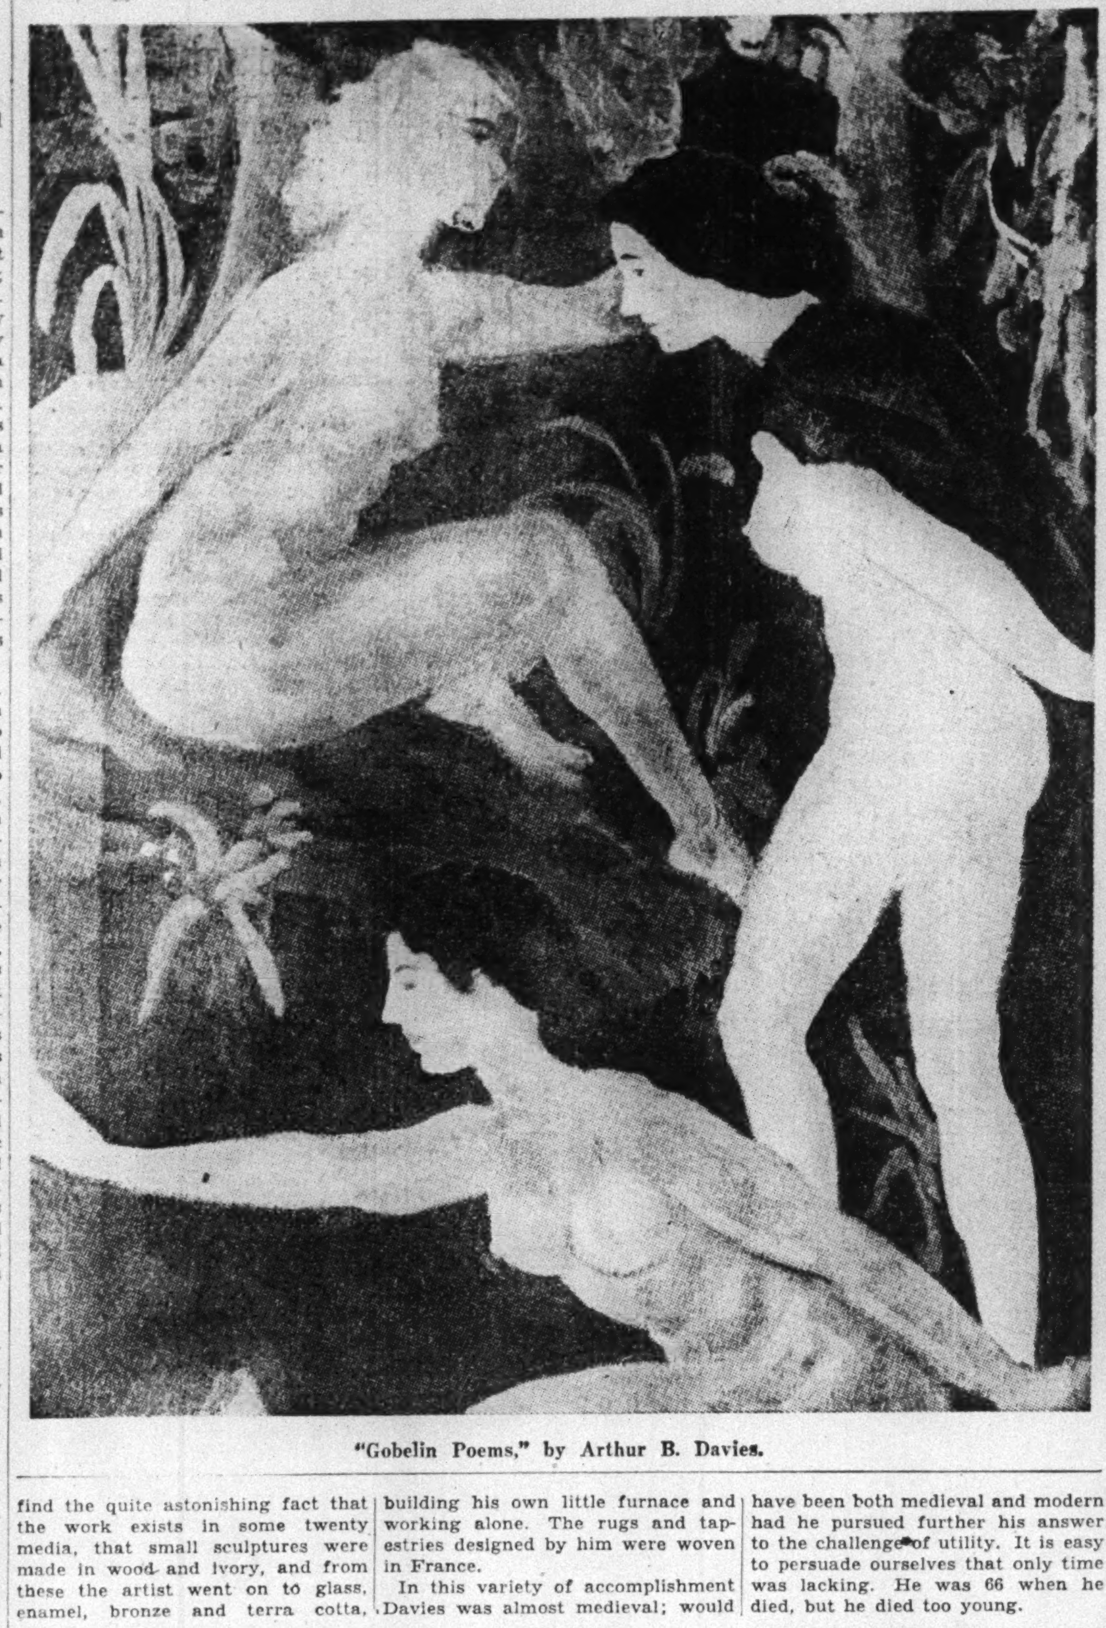
WITH all his dreaming, his spiritual isolation, his Welsh symbolism, Davies was a practical man and a man to whom muscular movement was an important problem in art. The finest of his figure subjects are those dealing with wrestlers. Especially fine are those in which he echoes in the motion of human beings the billowing lines of mountain summits or the ceaseless ebb and flow of waves. In one picture (a forgotten title is of little consequence in the book of Davies's art) wrestling men on the near shore repeat in the movement of their struggling limbs the heavy rhythm of distant waves. The effect is impressive, not only as linear triumph but psychologically as a symbol of the unity of man with nature.

Frederic Newlin Price, in what is probably the deepest and purest reading of Davies that has been accorded the public, fills in his appreciation of him with many facts that help to sustain a glowing enthusiasm for man and work. Among others we find the quite astonishing fact that the work exists in some twenty media, that small sculptures were made in wood and ivory, and from these the artist went on to glass, enamel, bronze and terra cotta, building his own little furnace and working alone. The rugs and tapestries designed by him were woven in France.

In this variety of accomplishment Davies was almost medieval; would have been both medieval and modern had he pursued further his answer to the challenge of utility. It is easy to persuade ourselves that only time was lacking. He was 66 when he died, but he died too young.



"Gobelin Poems," by Arthur B. Davies.

ART IN BRUSSELS AND ELSEWHERE

BRUSSELS.

A REMARKABLE exhibition of Despiau's work was held recently in the Brussels Palais de Beaux-Arts. Charles Despiau and Maillol are, since the death of Bourdelle, certainly the greatest living French sculptors. Never was such a Despiau ensemble—sculptures and drawings—presented in Paris. Despiau himself attended the opening of the exhibition in Brussels. He looked confused and shy. He is a type of simple peasant of his "Landes." He told the writer that he would like to live in that native country of his, spending his time fishing and shooting—and working, of course, but only when inspiration comes.

The Palais de Beaux-Arts housed at the same time an exhibition of modern Japanese art without great interest, except for Foujita who had a room to himself.

Those exhibitions have now given way to a great restrospective of Permeke, brutal but powerful modern Flemish painter of the sea and of peasant life. Permeke is a man of about 45. He worked hard before the war, but was absolutely unknown. He fought as an infantry soldier, and after the armistice resumed painting. Fame came suddenly to him in Belgium and in Germany.

A few weeks ago members of the Belgian artistocracy organized at the Brussels Opera House a curious pageant called "Les Fastes Belges," representing some famous periods of Belgian history. L. P.

In Budapest.

AN exhibition of paintings and sculpture by contemporary American artists is being shown in the Nemzeti Salon, Budapest, Hungary, during the month of February, under the joint auspices of the American Federation of Arts and the Hungary Society of America. The patrons include Count Laszlo Széchényi, the Minister from Hungary to the United States; Butler Wright, United States Minister to Hungary; Count Klebelsberg, Minister of Education, Hungary, and Louis Walko, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Hungary. The exhibition, consisting of thirty-eight paintings by as many artists and twelve bronzes by eleven sculptors, was chosen under the advice of a committee composed of Homer Saint-Gaudens, director of the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh; William M. Milliken, curator of painting, Cleveland Museum of Art; Royal Cortissoz, art critic of The New York Herald Tribune, and Miss Leila Mechlin (ex officio), secretary of the American Federation of Arts and editor of The American Magazine of Art. The Phillips Memorial Gallery, Washington, D. C., and the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, made generous loans, as did individual artists. The exhibition was shipped on the President Roosevelt Dec. 31.

The Federation's purpose in assembling this exhibition of paintings and bronzes by contemporary American artists was to manifest as far as possible the character and development of these arts in the United States and thus enable art lovers in Hungary to extend their acquaintance with them. Therefore, the works included (with but five exceptions) are by living artists—men and women who have attained distinction and are still creating.

IMPORTANT GERMAN SALE.

AT Rudolph Lepke's Kunst-Auctions-Haus, in the Potsdamerstrasse, Berlin, an imposing array of art will be put on the block next month. Exhibited from March 13 to March 17, the items will be sold at two sessions, morning and afternoon, on Tuesday, March 18. Among the paintings we find represented artists of the Holland School of the seventeenth century, and of the Flemish, German and Italian schools. In addition to these there will be sculpture, textiles, tapestries, furniture, glass, majolica, faience and metal work.

These catalogues from Germany are wont to be sumptuous affairs. Turning the pages of the catalogue at hand, one encounters a bright roster of names: Nicolaes Maes, Jan Steen, Jacob Ruysdael, Van Dyke, Lucas Cranach and many of lesser fame. Chief among the sculptors represented are Andrea della Robbia (two exquisite pieces) and Francesco Francia.

OUR MODERN MUSEUMS

Acquisitions, Speculations — Work Shown And to Come—New Matisse Monograph

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL.

WITH a total of four canvases as a nucleus for its permanent collection, the Museum of Modern Art has now established its promise outside the exhibition arena. Before the famous "Nineteen" show closed it was announced that Kenneth Hays Miller's woman combing her hair and Bernard Karfiol's seated nude had been purchased by Mr. Goodyear and Mrs. Rockefeller, respectively, and presented to the museum. Last week two more American pictures were added—Edward Hopper's "House by the Railroad" and Charles Burchfield's "Railroad Gantry"—given by Stephen C. Clark.

"Because of unexpectedly large attendance," the Museum of Modern Art announces the decision to extend its present exhibition of "Painting in Paris," keeping the spirited display on until March 2. No getting away from the fact that popular interest in art has enormously increased. Gallery after gallery has had to extend the run of exhibitions this season. Attendance figures for "Painting in Paris" are impressive: nearly 35,000 for the first three weeks; on Saturdays an average of more than 3,000—throngs so dense that "it is practically impossible to see the paintings."

Through March and the first half of April, it is announced, a series of smaller exhibitions will be held, including one-man shows by Max Weber, Paul Klee and Charles Burchfield (early water-colors). Toward the end of April is to come the important show of work by Winslow Homer, Thomas Eakins and Albert P. Ryder, delayed because of the recent gift of Eakins paintings to the Philadelphia Museum—canvases that are now on display there and many of which it is hoped will be lent for the subsequent affair in New York.

CONSIDERABLE speculation—entirely unofficial, as speculation is wont to be—concerns problematical permanent quarters for the Museum of Modern Art and for the Whitney Museum of American Art. Those who read Henry McBride's "Palette Knife" comment in the current issue of Creative Art can hardly escape a skipping of the pulse over his announcement that the Museum of Modern Art is to occupy the old Anderson Galleries at the corner of Park Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. In the next sentence the reader's pulse returns to normal, or possibly goes a little sub, for it develops that the Modern Art Museum people don't as yet know anything about that project. The premises are pretty full of auction ghosts, but ghosts, prowling only at night, wouldn't be likely to cause any major embarrassment. If the Heckscher group doesn't want it, might it do for the Whitney museum? There are those 400 pictures, which are going to require a lot of wall space.

Be that as it may, the inspiration is Mr. McBride's, and whatever responsibilities it may entail he must shoulder. It but remains for us this week to record another piece of enterprise, quite aside from prophecy, on Mr. McBride's part. His Matisse monograph has just been issued by Alfred A. Knopf, a second in the "Modern Art" series. There are fifty plates in half-tone and a frontispiece reproduction of the Chester Dale "Odalisque Bras Levés" in color. The text is witty and revealing, done in Mr. McBride's best style. Enthusiasm, while liberally informing every page, doesn't run away with him. Mr. McBride's humor may be counted upon to prevent any such contretemps. One is particularly interested in his championing of the extraordinary bronze female figure that fetched a laugh when put up in the Davies sale last year. This championing involves a brief visit to Matisse's studio and a glimpse of the master himself playing his "bad boy" rôle in the nonplussed presence of McBride, Roger Fry and Bryson Burroughs.

THE Whitney Studio Galleries will presumably go out of existence next November with the opening in Eighth Street of the Whitney Museum of American Art. But for the present they continue to function with all the old-time vigor. Paying an early morning call last Monday, the writer found the rooms claimed by a confusion of arriving and departing art. John Steuart Curry, James d'Agostino and Loutchansky, who had taken up occupancy on Jan. 28, were moving out, full of honors, while Caroline Speare Rohland, Dujam Penic and Rosella Hartman were moving hopefully in.

As a matter of fact, Mr. d'Agostino's water-colors had already disappeared, and some huskies in aprons were wheeling off on their little cart, such as is used for moving pianos, the last piece of previously exhibited sculpture—a large male torso that appeared to be going through the ordeal with something like Attic calm and Doric stoicism. Fortunately, the Curry canvases were still stacked in a corner, so that one who missed the previous show was able to get a last-minute idea of what this gifted American painter has been doing of late. Apparently, unless the canvases were executed from memory, Mr. Curry spent a large part of 1929 out in Kansas—a State for which he has already done so much and that has handsomely rewarded him for his faith. The remarkable "Baptism in Kansas," seen a year or two ago at the Corcoran, wasn't there, but "Gospel Train" and the description of a prairie cyclone and a prairie encampment and the farmer and his wife sitting contentedly in their parlor offered satisfactory compensation. Curry is making a real place for himself and ought to be on any list, not too importantly brief, of living American artists who are working in the American idiom. Perhaps he will even appear on some of the lists sent in to The Arts in connection with its "Game of the Month" contest, which aspires to arrive at the all-American Nineteen. This contest, by the way, closes March 1.

None of the present exhibitors at the Whitney Studio Galleries can compete with Mr. Curry in the matter of excitement. Nevertheless, Caroline Speare Rohland's pastels are both delicate and forceful, "Dessert" being especially good (the lady who is engaged in eating this elaborate sweet is the sort who is always deprecating: "I know I shouldn't, but it's just too irresistible, and I'll take only a thin little slice of unbuttered toast for breakfast"). "The Side Show" and "Carnival at Nice" are also deftly handled. Roselle Hartman's drawings of flowers combine artistry and an unmistakable, contagious affection for the subject, while Dujam Penic's sculpture is notable for its economy—lines flowing inward; nothing in excess—and for the attractive bloom of its surfaces. Postures are of the "baigneuse" and "repos" sort, with "contemplation" hovering near by.

Ernest Fiene.

SEVERAL examples of Ernest Fiene's work are included in the "33" show at the Grand Central Galleries, which concludes with a special session today. Fiene has long been identified with the Downtown group, but is now giving an uptown performance at the Rehn Galleries, where oils, water-colors and drawings occupy all three rooms. It is a show calculated to widen Mr. Fiene's public, winning him new friends and strengthening old ties.

Although the artist has been spending nearly a year in Paris, the experience seems not to have made serious inroads upon the originality of his style. It is not yet a "great" style, but there is much about it that is winning. Fiene offers evidence of a break with Woodstock conventions. Some one has just been marveling at the quantity of brown paint apparently de rigueur up there in that mountainous resort. Mr. Fiene has never gone in much for the brown paint ritual, but he has in the past succumbed heavily to the "primitive." This persuasion mirrors itself in "Riverboat," seen hitherto repeatedly, and in the landscapes. But there are more recent pictures, and these—conspicuously "Girl Reading," "Nude With Lilacs," several nudes without lilacs, "Lucienne With Doll," "Girl With Red Blouse," "Mother and Child" (a subject twice essayed)—argue the adoption of a fresh esthetic principle. The water-colors are in certain respects quite as good as the oils. There seems to be not a little Marin in them, but they live an independent life of their own too.

Bob Davis's "Psycho-graphs."

Some people make their boast in truth's despite,
But when Bob makes a boast he's always right.

HARRY KEMP affixes the above couplet to the photograph of him made by Mr. Davis, and those who visit the large exhibition of "psycho-graphs" at the American-Anderson Galleries are likely to feel that this compliment does not exceed the limits of what is rational and just. These are extraordinarily fine photographs ("psychos" if you prefer); about the final word, one suspects, in portrait photography. Mr. Davis says what he is after is the soul of his subject. That leads us into difficult metaphysical fields; but at any rate, what results is by no means a mere casual impression of the moment, caught by an impersonally snapping lens. We may as well call it the soul—haunted though we be by what another of the sitters inscribes: in effect, that Mr. Davis discovers in our faces what we are trying to hide. Indeed, if you have anything to hide it will be advisable for you to stay away from Bob Davis's searching eye.

Besides reporting the labor of a true and sincere artist, this collection brings forward an army of fascinating personalities, many of them front-pagers.

SALT HUMOR.

KAJ KLITGAARD is one of our most versatile humorists. Whether his medium be picture or the printed page, he communicates a species of humor that is as authentic as it is rare. Those who saw his exhibition last year at the Weyhe Galleries witnessed this gift at its best, and those who read the yarn just published by Doubleday-Doran, called "Seven Months and Seven Days," will experience the same warming sense of pleasure. Jacket blurbs are not always strictly reliable; but the modest description printed on the jacket of "Seven Months and Seven Days" may be taken as it stands, for what it is worth—and it is worth all it says: "The journal of a tramp steamer's voyage around the world, kept by the second mate, a keen, sensitive and imaginative artist." There are also amusing decorations.

Among the recent purchases of the Cleveland Museum is a marble statue of Kwan Yin, a Bodhisattva, usually referred to as the Goddess of Mercy.

FURTHER COMMENT ON EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

ABOUT TOWN

Many Artists in One-Man and Group Shows

By RUTH GREEN HARRIS.

A PERSUASIVE artist can force you to see with his eyes. Stendhal talks about the architecture of the Faubourg St. Germain, and while reading that critical page in "Le Rouge et le Noir" you disparage the building with him, no matter how much you may have enjoyed its nineteenth-century substance, passing it every day. The English painter Bassett Wilson loves the Faubourg, and through his painting persuades you of its worth, compels you to value its solidity, its self-respect and the beauty of its heavy classic curves.

Bassett Wilson has what Wilenski calls a "vivid sense of pictorial construction." It may be for that reason that his pictures are like a super-trip around the world. He has seen those things every traveler hopes to find before starting out on his journey. So many travelers come back disappointed. Not so this artist, who refuses to abandon his own inner vision.

Not that there is anything mysterious or mystic about the work. Nothing could be more candid or straightforward, more stripped of mystery. And yet that persuasive optimistic vision would take you to the Boulevard St. Germain on a rainy day, because that happens to be the logical time to see it. With a paint-box full of frank color (sometimes it is water-color, sometimes oil), he saunters along the Seine. You feel his enthusiasm for the Quiberon Harbor in the Bay of Biscay; for Spain and Sicily. You share his delight when, in his own country, he paints a London street.

In Murial Wilson's painting there is all the frailty of over-sensitiveness. Her flowers are like the breath of flowers. Or, draining them of color as she does occasionally, leaving them lace white, the artist offers ghosts of flowers. And yet there is a vivacity about her painting that gives it a certain strength. Muriel and Bassett Wilson—The Knoedler Galleries—Closing Feb. 22.

Following their custom, the Knoedler Galleries present at this time of year an exhibition of engravings, etchings and woodcuts of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Included are not only works of the very famous, such as Lucas van Leyden, Mantegna and Schongauer, but also work by less known artists such as Dirk van Staren, Hirschvogel, Marc Antonio Raimondi and Jean Duvet.

AT THE Grand Central Galleries Margaret French Cresson, daughter of Daniel Chester French, is showing her sculpture until Feb. 22. Among her many distinguished sitters are Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd, Joseph P. Day and Major W. Penn Cresson. In "Father and Son" there is a pretty idea. Son—dimpled, toothless and smiling—is being supported by father's hand. All of father is indicated by the hand and arm that hold the child.

Edith Briscoe Stevens can go to Gloucester or Concarneau and find motives that other artists have not painted. At any rate, she is equipped to see them in a fresh way. She is very young and seems unable as yet to manage the expanse of a large canvas and make it equally important in all its parts, but the smaller sketches are consistent throughout, suggesting a talent that in no short time will be able to cope quite as successfully with greater space.

Vera Andrus's water-colors—land-marks of old New York, or rather old land-marks of New York—tell with much humor the story of those downtrodden frame houses that one sees along upper Riverside Drive. The drawing is good. In large spots of candid color she uses the medium adroitly and simply.—Edith Briscoe Stevens—Vera Andrus—The Morton Gallery—Closing Feb. 22.

AT the National Arts Club the seventh annual exhibition of living American etchers. Many of the contributions have been seen before, either this season or at exhibitions in other years. Rodney Thomson's sleepy cat looks new. In André Smith's "Rampart Houses" at Antibes, foundations are still sound, though the surface crumbles. In Walter Tittle's "Church" on a cold night the electric light on the corner of the street seems to splinter the dark. In Philip Kappel's "Boats" somehow the difference of their sizes makes them real. Harry Wickey shapes the breasts of Amazons and etches with masculine vigor the rocky sides of mountains.

Spirit and excitement abound in the three aquatints by Pop Hart, about pigs in the market place. One envies George Harper's "Girls" swinging their swings so high that they face the sun. Grant Reynard's "Carnegie Concert" is a subject that has proved to be as etchable as it looks in the flesh, viewed from the side of the highest balcony. One likes the rich line in Hortense Ferne's "Camel Market."

George Renonard in "Along the Beach" proves the value of the etcher's "nervous line." In John MacGilchrist's "Transports of the Sky" everything moves at top speed. "Neighborhood Park" by Philip Reisman contrasts a humble scene with a rich rococo composition. In Harry Sternberg's "Roundhouse" there is the drama of contrasting sizes. "Women Sewing," with nice curves and angles, is a new subject for Eugene Fitsch. An expressive white line on a black ground describes A. R. Stavenitz's "Chartreuse." Thomas Handforth's "Far West Fisheries" seem real enough to be near at hand. Zelle de Milhau produces dashing landscapes, and William Meyerowitz's rich-textured "New York" has quality only an artist can see.

Other Exhibitions.

KLEEMAN-THORMAN is showing until Feb. 22 woodcuts and etchings by a young Russian, I. Friedlander. Free from any apparent lesson, any horrors, or unsuccessful persuasion about the beauty of a landscape, "The Clown" is by far the outstanding contribution. The cutting of the wood is craftsman-like (in fact technically, all the work is able) and the composition distinguished. A clown, walking a tight-rope is placed high in the arrangement. Far down below, the tense audience is watching, and the very subject, the suspense that brings together the performer and his breathless spectators ("assistants," to use a nice French word), unifies the composition.

During the month the Pearson Gallery is holding its first exhibition of sculptors under 30 years of age. None of them is exactly what one would call precocious. However, the mask of a negress by Harold Cash is workmanlike; there is something sensitive about the eyes and ears of Michel Fields's "Old Mare," and Raymond Turner's "Female Figure" has a quality of reasonable weight comfortably handled.

Yolanda Kutsukian's paintings are at the Little Carnegie Playhouse. She has made a still life of a table, set not too pedantically for the first course. The color of everything—oysters, linen, wine glass, carafe, even bread—is properly nacreous, presenting a picture so appetizing that one wants to rush off to the nearest oyster bar.

At the Kennedy Galleries Lillian Miller has not only shown her Japanese woodblock prints, but has demonstrated and explained the process of printing in the Japanese manner. The craftsmanship of her work looks faultless to a foreigner and her sense of design and decoration is most pleasing.

Last week the American Hungarian Foundation showed work by Valer Ferency and Julius Sarkany, portraits and etchings.

In the galleries of the American Lithographic Company two illustrators, Steinhilber and Zadic, are showing lithographs and block prints—prints from stone and wood, as the announcement reads. Mr. Steinhilber is interested in landscapes, while Mr. Zadic's block prints are for the most part portraits.

At Teachers College, Columbia University, there are some hundred wood engravings by Lynd Ward. The engraving itself is expert; the black-and-white brilliant; the design compact. Sensitive to the fine distinction between drama and theatre, the artist can accentuate and exaggerate without straining too far the spectator's imagination. And so one is in sympathy with the prison scenes and can feel the reality of black shadows thrown from tiny specks.

Painting by Emma Fordyce MacRae may be seen at the International Art Centre until March 7. The artist is apparently interested in decoration rather than in painting and in wool rather than in paint. The decorative flower arrangements therefore are more in keeping with the technique than are the landscape or portraiture. The woolly texture that this artist simulates might be achieved more securely in wool. However, her enthusiastic foreword writer says: "A loveliness as of old textures constantly suggests itself in the work."

At the Harlow, McDonald Galleries during February there are some eighty etchings by Rembrandt. Walter Lippmann says that the theory of the "artist as prophet" has this serious defect: there is practically no evidence to support it. And yet, seeing these etchings one feels that Rembrandt controlled electricity long before one could push a button to light a dark room. Granted, this in a sentimental way is misquoting Mr. Lippmann. However, to quote again, this time from Lumsden's "Art of Etching":

"So much has been written in praise of Rembrandt by so many far abler writers than I, that there is no need for me to say more than that I fully endorse all but that extravagant praise which endeavors to make of one of the most human—and consequently most lovable—personalities the world has produced in historical times, a god whom no man may love, but only worship."

Victoria Ebbels Hutson was a member of the famous League class that graduated Kuniyoshi, Schnakenberg, Helen Appleton and Katherine Schmidt, all of them well known, having gone their various ways. Victoria Hutson, seen for the first time, is at her best when painting homely household things—the soap dish, the ink bottle, the potted primrose, and a bit of landscape seen through the window. Compositions are not as lively as they might be, but the strong emotion of the color and the beautiful quality of smooth paint push composition out of sight—until one sees it, unfairly perhaps, in the relentless black and white of a reproduction. Victoria Ebbels Hutson—The Weyhe Galleries—Closes Feb. 22.

Durand-Ruel, during the month, is exhibiting drawings by a group of those artists who helped make the gallery famous some fifty years ago. Still as young as ever, surely these drawings will never grow old or old-fashioned; will never lose their vitality and the muscle that is attenuated by Constantin Guys, rounded and hardened by Dégas, relaxed by Puvis, that moves freely with Mary Cassatt, and, because of the fearful subject, is tightened in the one Courbet shown.

An exhibition of paintings of natives from the Solomon Islands and New Guinea by Caroline Mytinger will remain at the Natural History Museum until Feb. 28. Living in isolated communities and on terms of hostility with neighboring tribes, local types differ greatly both in language and in custom. The divergence will appear more significant when it is realized that the several groups on one island often differ more from one another than do the inhabitants of the countries of present-day Europe. These paintings, interestingly, give much information about the people and their customs.

ART NOTES

Comment in Brief on Events Here and There

A COLLECTION of hitherto unexhibited drawings by George Biddle will be shown at Esther Markham's Gallery, 19 West Eighth Street, from Feb. 18 to March 15. This comparatively new gallery makes it a point to exhibit each month the work of American moderns, featuring black-and-white.

The third of a series of lectures for the benefit of the Needle and Bobbin Guild will be given by Professor Vittorio Macchioro, curator of the National Museum of Naples, on Monday afternoon, Feb. 17, at the Arden Gallery. The hour is 3:15.

The current sculpture show at the Ferargil Galleries includes examples by Wheeler Williams, Eugenie Shonnard, Antonio Salemme, Boris Lovet-Lorski, Robert Laurent, Roy Sheldon, Enid Bell, Heinz Warneke, Sciortino, Elisabeth Chase, Sava Botzaris, Ninna Harkavy, John L. Clarke, Rachel Hawks and Janet Scudder.

A Gilbert Stuart, a Gainsborough, an Ozias Humphrey, an Edouard Manet, a Wyant landscape, several Blakelocks and Remingtons, two Courbets and a Constant Troyon, the property of Peter W. Rouss and Leonard L. Stein, are on exhibition at the American-Anderson Galleries, preceding the sale that takes place Feb. 20.

Owing to unprecedented interest shown in its current exhibitions, the Grand Central Art Galleries will be open this afternoon from 3 to 6 o'clock.

Lise Fulda is holding an exhibition of etchings, drawings and oil paintings at Miss Corbett's Coffee House until March 1. The collection includes animal sketches and landscapes.

Exhibitions at the Art Centre include paintings by Gurdon Howe, woodblock prints by Mark Perper, paintings by Homer E. Ellerton, etchings and color prints by Charles W. Bartlett, work of members of the New York Society of Craftsmen, and Mexican craftwork. The fifth Opportunity Gallery showing has been chosen by Alfred Stieglitz.

PRESENT ART ACTIVITIES IN STOCKHOLM

By ALMA LUISE OLSON.

STOCKHOLM.

DEVELOPMENT of a museum of modern art in New York City gives timely point to an episode connected with the early history of Thiel's, the gallery of modern art in Stockholm. The collection originally belonged to the wealthy banker, Ernest Thiel. While his friend and hunting companion, Bruno Liljefors, was still a young and unknown artist of the wild life of forest and field, Thiel gave him an order for twenty paintings at 2,000 kroner apiece, with the understanding that any of the paintings could be resold if a better offer was received.

It was a brilliant opportunity and in time Bruno Liljefors became easily the foremost animal painter of our day. His fifty paintings are now the dominating note in Thiel's, which also possesses many outstanding canvases by Carl Larsson, Anders Zorn, Ernest Josephson, Richard Bergh, Nils Kreuger and many other prominent Swedish artists who were at the height of their power at the turn of the century.

This Thiel episode is one of many interesting stories told by Dr. K. E. Russow in his new book on Bruno Liljefors. Through Fritzi's, the Stockholm publisher, the volume has recently been made accessible also to a wider public through a limited English edition. The Swedish edition became a "best seller" here during the holiday season. The illustrations in color are especially commendable. It is not easy to reproduce faithfully the work of an artist whose absorbing interest is to see the wild life not against a contrasting background of nature but more accurately against its "protective likeness."

Bruno Liljefors will be 70 in the spring, and his zest for art is still unabated. Of late he has begun to turn to portrait painting, but he has so arranged his atelier in Stockholm, high in one of the city's two "skyscrapers," that his windows command a view of the sea, which he has painted so often. An exhibit of the "Great Three" (the other two are Anders Zorn and Carl Larsson) will be held shortly in Stockholm, and important new canvases by Liljefors are promised. In connection with the Stockholm Exhibition of Arts and Crafts, opening in May, the work of the young and rising school of Swedish artists will be shown.

An exhibit of the "Lama Tent," a Lamaist "temple" in miniature with all its appurtenances, attracted thousands of visitors recently at the Liljevalch Gallery, where it was shown for a week. It was a gift to King Gustav V of Sweden from Sin Tjin Gegen Khan, temporal and spiritual ruler (as the titles indicate) in Karaschar, a section of the province of Hsin Tschian, in Mongolia, bordering on Tibet and China. This is the only "temple" that as a complete unit has left the Buddhist-Lamaist world, and consequently it is of great interest to students of Oriental art.

The gift was entrusted to the two well-known travelers and explorers, Dr. Sven Hedin and Lieutenant H. Haslund, for safe conveyance to Stockholm. Within the temple a priest could be seen blessing a pilgrim. Another pilgrim, already blessed, was receiving tea from a servant in gala attire—there was an illusion of reality. On the altar stood familiar Lamaist insignia—"butter lamps," the prayer mill, the tankard filled with holy water. The walls were adorned with prayer flags. Several collectors of Oriental art had also loaned treasures to be shown simultaneously at Liljevalch's, but the Lama Tent was the centre of attraction.

Europe is being rebuilt. What is taking place today is more radical than anything that has happened since the days when the new ideals of the Renaissance began to supplant those of the old medieval city.

Observations like these are becoming a commonplace in the European press, and in Sweden architecture continues to be the burning question of the day. A distinctive national style of architecture developed here during the first three decades of this century. "But the keynotes of today," says Professor Eric Lallerstedt, dean of Swedish architects, "are internationalism and anti-romanticism. The younger group of workers treats romanticism as the cardinal sin."

Almost within view of the windows of his Stockholm home is the Technical Institute, his own design, executed in glowing red brick and pleasing simplicity of line. It now comes under the ban as romanticism; so, too, the magnificent Stockholm Town Hall, the Law Courts, the Stadium.

For at least four years, explains Professor Lallerstedt, with the genial tolerance that betrays the student of art rather than the champion of "trends," the younger Swedish architects have been working in the new manner. The really new note is not so much the fact that they are adapting style to the medium and technique with which they are working as the fact that the situation is being talked about more than ever before.

"Functionalism? Yes—it is an ugly word, but fairly expressive. It is responsible for the introduction of the flat roof into our national scene, although the Swedish climate in general militates against its practicability. And it is also responsible, of course, for the new ideal of generously expansive windows to let in the sun."

To the lay observer the situation in Sweden is profoundly engrossing. Just now, at the height of midwinter in Stockholm, one wonders whether the Swedish functionalist may not in his turn be dubbed the arch romanticist of them all. He builds to let in the sun—and there is no sun!

All factors combine to make the Swedish experiment peculiarly interesting. There is a feeling in the air that something vital is again in the making. With steel and reinforced concrete, Sweden, so to speak, is expressing its interpretation of internationalism.

Sculptural Design on Bok Tower by Lee Lawrie.

AT ARCHITECTURAL LEAGUE.

IN addition to the annual exhibition, the Architectural League of New York has inaugurated a series of one-man shows to present to the profession and to the general public a cross-section of the work of living American architects, painters and sculptors. These shows depict the processes of thought and work of individuals or firms who are making distinct contributions to modern American architecture and art design.

Showing concurrently with the major annual exhibition, the Architectural League has chosen to feature for its one-man exhibit, at its own gallery at 115 East Fortieth Street, the architectural sculpture of Lee Lawrie. This will be on view until the end of February. The work includes examples of his sculpture on the last buildings by Goodhue; on Medary's Florida Tower; also on buildings by Mayers, Murray and Phillip; by Zantzinger, Borie and Medary; on James Gamble Rogers's Harkness Memorial Tower; on Gehron and Ross's Memorial Bridge at Harrisburg, and on St. John's Cathedral and the State Capitol of Nebraska. Some of the actual working models are there and there are photographs of finished work in situ.

NUPTIAL DATES CROWD SOCIETY'S LATE FEBRUARY CALENDAR

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF WEDDING PLANS

Miss Barbara Stout's Ceremony to Take Place in Church of the Resurrection on Feb. 28—Miss Richardson's Plans

ALTHOUGH February never has been favored by prospective brides, several outstanding weddings have been planned for the last week of this month, three of them for the final day. On that day Miss Barbara Stout will become the bride of Harrington Putnam Jr., Miss Mary Leslie Fuller will be married to David Judson Randall Jr., and the marriage of Miss Florence Richardson to Lambert Lee Borden of this city takes place in Pittsfield, Mass.

The Church of the Resurrection in East Seventy-fourth Street, which reminds one of an old church in rural England, will be the scene of the marriage of Miss Stout to Mr. Putnam, with the rector, the Rev. E. Russell Bourne, officiating. The reception will be at the Colony Club.

There will be many entertainments for Miss Stout and her fiancé before their marriage. Miss Olivia Walker, one of her bridal attendants, will give a dinner for them on Feb. 26 at her home, 150 East Seventy-third Street, and the parents of Mr. Putnam, former Justice Harrington Putnam of the Supreme Court of New York, and Mrs. Putnam, will give a dinner for the entire bridal party at the St. Regis the night preceding the wedding.

Miss Stout, who is the elder daughter of Mrs. Joseph Suydam Stout and the late Mr. Stout, has chosen her sister, Miss Beatrice Stout, for maid of honor. Her other attendants will be Mrs. James Warren Lane, the former Miss Mary Agnes Warren; the Misses May Swords, a cousin of Miss Stout; Miss Virginia Furman and Miss Olivia Walker.

William Potts will be best man for Mr. Putnam, whose ushers are to be John Jacquelin Trask, a cousin of the prospective bride; Robert G. Bushnell, Benjamin E. Crispin and Julian Bulkley of New York; Francis Randolph Williams and Holmes Alexander of Baltimore. Miss Stout will be given in marriage by her brother, Joseph Suydam Stout. She is a granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. John H. Jacquelin and of the late Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Suydam Stout.

MANY New Yorkers will go to Pittsfield, Mass., for the marriage there in the chapel of St. Teresa on the morning of Feb. 28 of Miss Florence Richardson to Lambert Lee Borden of this city. Invitations to the ceremony are restricted to members of the two families and a few close friends, but those to the reception and wedding breakfast at the Hotel Wendell are more general.

Miss Richardson, who is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Charles Harper Richardson of Pittsfield, has chosen Miss Mary Lee Borden, sister of Mr. Borden, for maid of honor. The bridesmaids will be Miss Marion Baker of New York and Miss Margaret Walker of Pittsfield.

Mr. Borden is a son of Mrs. Charles Francis Scott of this city and the late Louis Lambert Borden. He will have his brother, Donald Borden, for best man. The ushers chosen are Chester Sawtelle of Englewood, N. J.; Frank McCabe of Albany, N. Y.; Robert Parker of Newark, N. J., and E. Rossiter Sawtelle of Boston.

Miss Richardson was graduated from Miss Mills's School in Pittsfield and the Gardner School of New York. Mr. Borden was graduated from Union College with the class of '29.

OLD New York families are interested in the marriage of Miss Elsie Benkard to Charles H. Clarke, which takes place on the afternoon of Feb. 26 at the home of her mother, Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, 132 East Sixty-fifth Street. Miss Benkard is the daughter of the late J. Philip Benkard and a granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. James Benkard, who for many years held a prominent place in New York society. Through her paternal grandmother, who was Miss Fanny Horton, Miss Benkard is related to many prominent Boston families.

On the maternal side Miss Benkard is a granddaughter of the late Stephen H. Olin, a prominent lawyer of his day and who for many years was a trustee of the New York Public Library. She is a great-granddaughter of the late Rev. Dr. Stephen Olin, second president of the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., and a descendant of the late Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. L. Barlow and also of Peter Townsend.

Mr. Clarke is the son of Mrs. Charles Clarke of this city and the late Mr. Clarke. During the World War he served as a second lieutenant in the 311th Infantry.

The marriage of Miss Benkard to Mr. Clarke will be very small, none but members of the two families and a few close friends having been asked to the ceremony. Miss Benkard will dispense with attendants and Mr. Clarke will have only a best man, Edward Robinson.

After their wedding trip Mr. Clarke and his bride will live at 204 East Forty-first Street.

IN St. Patrick's Cathedral on the morning of Feb. 25 Miss Veronica Curry, daughter of John F. Curry, Tammany leader, and Mrs. Curry, will become the bride of Edmund M. McCarthy of Springfield, Mass. Mgr. John P. Chidwick, rector of St. Agnes's Church, long a friend of the Curry family, will perform the ceremony, which will be followed by a nuptial mass. Afterward there will be a reception and wedding breakfast at the Plaza.

Mrs. John W. McGrath Jr. of Springfield, Mass., a sister of Mr. McCarthy, will be matron of honor and Miss Marie Mattern, maid of honor. For bridesmaids Miss Curry has chosen the Misses Miriam Talley, Alice Hicks, Alyse Murphy, Virginia McManus, Eva Molinari, Catherine Crohan, Mae Dunphy and Helen Reilly.

Thomas Condon will be best man. The ushers chosen are Frank and John F. Curry Jr., brothers of Miss Curry; John Deely, Leonard Warner, John W. McGrath Jr., Frank Carson, Leonard Schnetzer, Neylan Sampson, Joseph Beagan and Harry Young.

PLAYS IN THE SERVICE OF PHILANTHROPY

TO advance the work of philanthropic causes, there will be a number of benefit theatrical performances in the near future, including two this week and one next, of "Ripples," the new show with Fred Stone at the New Amsterdam Theatre.

On Tuesday night the net proceeds will be devoted to the social service auxiliary of the Metropolitan Hospital on Welfare Island. The auxiliary has as president Mrs. F. Meredith Blagden, who succeeded Mrs. John A. Topping, now its honorary president. Mrs. Topping held office for eight years. The proceeds from the later diversion will be added to the general fund.

The institution to benefit from the entertainment was opened recently adjoining Riis House, one of the oldest neighborhood settlements in the city. At the health centre work is carried on among families of small means whose children receive examination and treatment.

A junior committee has been formed for the theatre party and dance. Headed by Miss Barbara Loudon, the group includes the Misses Mary Delafield, Jean Sargent, Betty Putnam, Theodora and Lois Barstow, Catherine Dominick, Susan Hall and Adelaide Ingram. THE third benefit performance of "Ripples" will take place on the night of Feb. 24. It will aid the Mission Kindergartens supported by the Froebel League. The Kindergarten Committee of the league is composed of a group of women interested in establishing and supporting schools for very young children of working mothers and the needy poor.

The schools supported by the committee take all children under school age, irrespective of race or creed. Some of the institutions whose maintenance depends on the work of the committee are the Bethany Kindergarten at the Bethany Day Nursery, the Susan Blow Kindergarten at the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, the Home Thrift Kindergarten at Thrift House and the Kindergarten at Miss Master's Day Nursery in Broome Street.

In the last fourteen years the mission kindergartens have been supported solely by voluntary contributions and the proceeds from occasional benefits.

PROMINENT Russians living in this city are lending their support to plans for a Mardi Gras Ball and carnival to be held on the night of March 3 in the new ballroom of the Plaza for the benefit of the Russian Charity Society, Inc. The event will be under the patronage of Princess Xenia and Princess Nina of Russia.

The occasion will mark the thirteenth anniversary ball of the society, which was organized in New York in October, 1915, for the purpose of aiding poor parishoners of the Russian Cathedral and supporting the Russian orphanage. BOYS' CLUB ALUMNI GIVE DANCE

First Annual Entertainment of New Association Has Notable Sponsors—Aims of the Group

ALUMNI of the Boys' Club of New York are now at work on plans for their first annual entertainment and dance, which will be held on Feb. 21 in Pythian temple, 135 West Seventieth Street.

The alumni have an association, organized less than two years ago at the suggestion of Mrs. E. Roland Harriman, chairman of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the club, for the purpose of bringing together the many men who were graduated from the Tompkins Square Branch of the Boys' Club several years ago. It is expected that this initial gathering of the alumni will be attended by all the members now enrolled in the Alumni Association, as well as many men who have not yet learned of the existence of the association of graduates.

The Boys' Club of New York has its clubhouses at Tompkins Square and Jefferson Park and through them it seeks to provide a sort of second home for boys of the east side. In the fifty-four years of its existence the club has assisted approximately 150,000 boys toward better citizenship, most of them now occupying positions of high standing in many professions. The Alumni Association is now striving to locate many hundreds of the boys, now men, who once belonged to the club.

At a recent election Charles H. Sabin was elected president.

Tickets for the dance and entertainment may be obtained from William H. Hiss at the club, Avenue A and Tenth Street.

KETTLEDRUM ENLISTS WIDE AID

Many in Society to Supervise Booths at Annual Event For the Samaritan Home for the Aged

PLANS are well under way for the annual St. Valentine's Kettledrum in aid of the Samaritan Home for the Aged, which is to be held on the afternoon of Feb. 28 in the ballroom of the Plaza. In years past it has been a feature of the feast day of the saint when possible but it had to be placed for a later date this year. There will be added interest this year in the entertainment because of the presentation in the new ballroom and the suite adjoining, in which there will be various other attractions. A room will be set aside where bridge, contract or mah jong can be played and in yet another room there will be served tea and light refreshments.

Since its inception more than a half a century ago the Kettledrum has held a place in the affections of those who have made the home an abiding place for gentlefolk in need. It is due to a handsome legacy from the estate of the late Mrs. John Innes Kane that it has been possible to leave the old home in West Twenty-second Street for the new structure in East Eighty-eighth Street. There is always need for funds for the upkeep of the new place even though several shops have been constructed in it from the rent of which there is a certain income.

PARTICULAR attention is being paid to diversions for juveniles, who look forward to the event. There will be simple games, trained animals and dancing. At the handsomely appointed booths there will be on sale the handiwork of inmates of the home, all of whom have displayed notable cleverness, as well as contributed embroideries and drawn work made by friends of the institution.

The Plaza Orchestra will play for general dancing. There will be a fortune teller and also an artist who will make silhouettes for those who care to possess souvenirs of the afternoon.

Some of those who are to preside at the various booths are Mrs. Eugene S. Reynal, Mrs. Harry Horton Benkard, Mrs. W. Kintzing Post, Mrs. Howland Davis, Mrs. Edwards Spencer, Mrs. Francis Smyth and Mrs. Rudolph H. Kissel.

They will have the assistance of Mrs. Reginald P. Rose, Mrs. N. Thayer Robb, Mrs. Alfred Wagstaff, Mrs. William D. Guthrie, Mrs. Howard Carroll, Mrs. Effingham Lawrence, Mrs. Edward Hancy, Mrs. Francis C. Huntington, Mrs. Alfred Kessler and others who are among the directors of the home.

FOR the card room tables there will be a separate charge of $12 each. These are on sale at the home of Mrs. Edward Fales Coward, 64 East Ninetieth Street. Single cards of admission for the room are put at $3 each, and these include admittance to the Kettledrum, which this year will be conducted more like a kirmess than in former years.

Mrs. Henry Scott Rokenbaugh is attending to the details of the card games and in addition to Mrs. Coward she is having the aid of Mrs. Samuel L. Fuller, Mrs. T. Towar Bates, Miss Margaret Remsen, Mrs. Rudolph H. Kissel, Mrs. George B. Hopkins and Mrs. Benkard.

SOCIAL RESEARCH SCHOOL DINNER

Assisting Dr. Johnson and the board of directors are two committees under Joseph Milner and Mrs. Milton I. Durlach. Members of the Advisory Committee and the board include Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Leonard K. Elmhirst, Mrs. Thomas W. Lamont, Mrs. Daniel O'Day, Mrs. George Haven Putnam, Mrs. Joseph R. Swan, Miss Willa Cather, Miss Florina Lasker, Dr. Ada L. Reid, who is arranging the dance program. William G. Thayer, principal of St. Mark's School in Southboro, Mass., who is retiring in June, will be a guest of honor.

Girling, who is assisted by Ludlow L. Melius, Dow G. Roof, F. Michler Bishop, G. Melville Campbell and James M. Robeson.

A HOSPITAL DANCE.

PALM BEACH SEASON LENGTHENING

Notable Events Planned by Colonists for Early March—Yacht Club Regatta This Week

PALM BEACH, FLA.

THE approaching week, in years past greeted as the culmination of the Palm Beach season, in this day is merely a continuation of the month's festivities. Many important events are planned for next month, among them the costume ball at the Everglades Club on March 6. The date of the annual ball at the Bath and Tennis Club has not yet been announced.

This Winter's big event at the Royal Poinciana Hotel will be the Flower Show, to be held in the new hotel conservatories during the last two days of February. The show is to be put on by the Garden Club of Palm Beach and by the Palm Beach Gardeners' Association.

On Friday and Saturday of this week the eighth annual Yacht Club Regatta on Lake Worth will claim the attention of Winter visitors. Craft of all descriptions have been assembling in the yacht basin during the month, and a full program is planned. An ocean cruiser race will be one of the high lights, for which a handsome trophy, a ship's clock with thermometer and barometer attached, has been offered by William F. Crosby, editor of The Rudder.

The final round of the annual handicap tournament of the Old Guard Society of Palm Beach golfers will be held tomorrow on the course of the Palm Beach Golf Club. Trophies will be awarded on Tuesday evening at the annual dinner, which this year will be given at the Breakers Hotel. Reservations for more than 200 members and their guests have been received.

The next event planned by the Old Guard is the senior tourney, which will take place on Thursday of this week. Entrants must be at least 70 years of age in order to enter. There will be a team match added to this year's schedule, captained by General J. Ernest Smith and George Wright, each of whom is more than 80.

BILLIE BURKE, wife of Florenz Ziegfeld, has agreed to do some producing herself. Promoters of the annual benefit show put on at the Paramount Theatre by the local Kiwanis Club to aid their fund for under-privileged children have persuaded Mrs. Ziegfeld to act as chairman of the managers and producers' committee. This post has been filled in former years by Arthur Hammerstein, who is at present on the Pacific Coast. Mrs. Ziegfeld will have the support of the entire theatrical colony in Florida in the production of the show, on Feb. 25.

The third of the series of Society of Arts concerts will be given tomorrow evening at the Everglades Club. The first two, symphony concerts, which were given in the Paramount Theatre, were open to the public; the three remaining concerts, open only to members of the society, will be given at the club. Tomorrow evening's program by George Copeland, pianist, and Josephine Luccese, soprano, in joint concert, will be followed by a buffet supper for members of the society, in the Orange Gardens of the club.

The third of the Current Events Lectures, this time on political affairs in Hungary, will be delivered by Michael Karolyi, former President of Hungary, on Wednesday afternoon. Each of the lectures, of which there are five during the season, is given at the home of a member of the course. This week's is to take place at Qui-Si-Sana, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Earle Perry Charlton.

Several interesting exhibitions are being held in Palm Beach at the moment. The exhibition of Swedish and Danish handicraft is being continued in Via Mizner, under the sponsorship of Addison Mizner. Princess Alexis Obolensky's exhibition of Kentucky handicraft, which was removed from the Michaelyan Galleries upon the Princess's return to New York, is being shown by Miss Ilsa Francke.

An artist new to Palm Beach is the Countess Korzybska (née Edgerly), who arrived a fortnight ago to spend the Winter. An exhibition of her portraits on ivory, which was opened on Thursday at the Everglades Club, will be continued until Feb. 20.

GIRLS' LEAGUE EVENT

STATE CHARITIES AID UNIT CHANGES DATE OF PARTY

A CHANGE was made recently in the plans of the New York City Visiting Committee of the State Charities Aid Association for a theatre party on the night of Feb. 25 in aid of the association's work. "Out of a Blue Sky" at the Booth Theatre has been substituted for the "International Revue," which was to have been taken over for that night.

The new play, featuring Reginald Owen, has already had an encouraging subscription.

A junior committee of aides, under the leadership of Miss Virginia S. Kellogg, includes the Misses Ruth Buckner, Barbara and Harriet Cox, Dorothy Lawrence, Phoebe Fischer, Elizabeth Rhodes and Margaret Spence.

THE JAILS STILL YAWN FOR THE POOR DEBTOR

Judgments Against People Unable to Pay Lead to Cells, But the Passing of a Century Has Tempered Punishment With Mercy.

By BERTRAM REINITZ.

ALTHOUGH the once widespread practice of jailing otherwise law-abiding citizens for failing to pay their debts has been largely eliminated in New York, the civil code still embraces several statutes under which debtors may be detained as guests of the county in which the default occurs.

Public attention was directed to this fact recently by Justice Nathan M. Sweedler of the City Court in Brooklyn. Justice Sweedler pointed out that while the existence of an alimony club in the jails of each county was generally and somewhat facetiously known, very little has been said of the other impecunious prisoners whose plight is not an aftermath of marital difficulties. The records of the Raymond Street Jail, in Brooklyn, reveal that, in the course of the most recent complete fiscal year, seventy-one debtors were held pending liquidation of various liabilities other than arrears of alimony. Fifty-four delinquent husbands were impounded during that period.

Motor car accidents were responsible for the detention of many of the county's involuntary guests in the debtor class. Their arrests—termed "body executions" to distinguish them from detention for penal offenses—are subsequent to two or three long, legal steps after the prisoner's loss of suit for damages brought by some pedestrian who had been struck by the car of the prisoner. Unable to satisfy the judgment and either unwilling to file a petition in bankruptcy or unaware of that expedient, the legal victims were then garnered by an under-sheriff or two and installed in a stone-and-steel jail.

The Cause of Incarceration.

Justice Sweedler believes that few, if any, of those thus committed in consequence of automobile accidents possess sleek sedans equipped with French horns, cigar lighters and flower vases. In most of the cases coming within his knowledge, he found that the machines involved were in such advanced stages of decreptitude as to be well-nigh oblivious of the driver's efforts to steer or stop them.

One venerable car was parked at the top of an East New York hill when gravity overcame the slight restraining influence of the toothless emergency brake. The car, employed in the transportation of furniture for an upholsterer of small means but large family, plunged down the incline and up on a sidewalk, to the painful surprise of a passer-by.

When the upholsterer, bearing a moulting mohair chair, emerged from a customer's house, he feared at first that his machine had been stolen. Then, glancing down the hill, he regretted that it had not. He did not defend the suit for damages against him and a verdict in excess of $8,000 was returned for the plaintiff.

Deeply busied in his efforts to restuff enough parlor furniture to support a family of six, the upholsterer did not study the formidable documents that he found in his letterbox from time to time. He was quite naturally astonished subsequently when two men visited his home, exhibited badges and warrants, and took him into the Raymond Street jail.

Friends of the upholsterer, however, appealed to Mr. Sweedler (then counsel to the Sheriff of Kings County) to drop one of the county's wards in order to avoid acquiring six more, since the family was destitute. The Sheriff's counsel invoked the protection of the bankruptcy law in behalf of the prisoner and he was released after four anguished weeks.

Judgment debtors can expiate their obligation by serving three months, if the amount involved is under $500, or six months if more is at stake. Unfortunately for the alimony men, however, their embittered spouses can obtain successive judgments for the arrears accruing while the quondam partners are in jail.

Civil arrests in this State are limited to cases involving the recovery of damages for personal injury, for breach of promise, for fraud or deceit, and for damages resulting from conversion or misappropriation of property. Other candidates for the county lock-up include persons who refuse to pay fines or penalties imposed by civil bureaus or departments. Employers indebted to workers for wages may also be committed, and about a dozen angry and unpaid artisans annually exercise this power.

At present the debtor personnel in local jails is extremely small, a condition due, according to the justice to an increasing unwillingness on the part of most people to put others in jail. No forebearance of this kind was greatly in evidence in the New York of the early nineteenth century, when as many as 1,200 persons were thrust into the city prison for debt in one year.

A More Summary Action.

There were no devious preliminaries to those arrests of an earlier day, although the great majority of the cases involved obligations amounting to less than $50. The creditor merely filed evidence of the debt with the Sheriff, who dispatched an assistant to collect either the debt or the debtor. The law that prescribed imprisonment for the defaulters omitted provisions for their sustenance.

Private philanthropy alone saved the truly indigent from starvation. Wealthy citizens and charitable organizations subscribed to a food fund for these prisoners, but, even with this succor, there is no record of any of them finding it necessary to go on a reducing diet after a few months in the city jail. Convicts and other malefactors serving terms for highway robbery, felonious assault or other transgressions more flagrant than overlooking a $10 board bill were often housed with these debtors, but enjoyed the decided advantage over them of having their needs supplied and served by the Commonwealth.

Although the incarceration of a debtor of that time was effected thus quickly and simply, his release could be obtained only after involved and prolonged legal processes. Some of these unfortunates remained in limbo for years, eventually emerging too broken or refractory to do much in the way of earning a livelihood.

After an old Revolutionary War soldier had been discovered rounding out five years of detention in the gloomy city prison for neglecting to repay some long forgotten loan, and after many other similar tragedies had been disclosed, the smoldering resentment of public-spirited citizens against imprisonment for debt flamed into a vigorous and successful protest. In 1823 the civil code was amended to place small debtors beyond the prison pale.

At Old Fleet Prison in London hundreds of debtors faced death from famine, since the community vouchsafed lodging without board to such prisoners. For years an especially hungry looking inmate sat in a kind of cage in the wall of Old Fleet, rattled a tin box with all his meagre strength and called out, "Remember the poor debtors," in doleful and monotonous repetition.

In the mill towns of England hundreds of workers, held for negligible debts, were released, leaving upon the walls of their cells such legends as this, noted in Manchester's jail, by an ardent debtors' act advocate:

"Me an' Ned Peak,
We've been here three week,
An' we're wasting our time
For no reason or crime;
Just doing no good in a great big room
When we might be workin' at the loom."

AGAIN AN ISSUE: "WHAT IS INTOXICATING?"

Is It ½ of 1 Per Cent or 2.75?—Senator Sheppard and Representative Dyer Argue the Question of Alcoholic Content of Lawful Beverages Which Now Sharply Divides Both Congress and Medical Opinion

WHAT is intoxicating liquor? How much alcohol may a beverage contain before it passes from the category of drink that may lawfully be imbibed in the United States of America and becomes a violation of the Constitution? With the opening of hearings last Wednesday on measures seeking modification of the prohibition laws in Congress, these questions once more attract widespread interest.

The Volstead act contains the definition of intoxicating liquor that is in force at the present time and the courts have upheld it. Any drink that contains one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume is intoxicating, according to the act. But this, the wets contend, is simply an arbitrary interpretation of the Eighteenth Amendment, pointing to the wording which says that:

"After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

If Congress could fix that definition, the wets argue, it can fix another. This is why the wets hope to pass a bill legalizing 2.75 per cent beer, which they contend is, in fact, non-intoxicating.

In considering the controversy over what constitutes intoxicating liquor four phases may be stressed: The one-half of 1 per cent standard, the 2.75 per cent standard, the views brought forth in Congress at the time the Volstead act was passed, and medical opinion on both sides. These phases are discussed in the following article.

The views of two outstanding Congressional leaders, Senator Sheppard of Texas, a foremost dry, and Representative Dyer of Missouri, whose 2.75 beer bill is now before the House, are published as important contributions to the discussion.

WHICH SPIGOT?

I.

The ½ of 1% Standard.

By MORRIS SHEPPARD, Senator From Texas.

IN exercising the power conferred upon it by the Federal Constitution to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment Congress passed the law commonly known as the Volstead act. That law provides, among other things, that whenever the word "liquor" and the phrase "intoxicating liquor" occur in any of its provisions they shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter and wine, and, in addition thereto, any spirituous, vinous, malt or fermented liquor, liquids and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol.

One of the purposes of Congress in fixing a definite amount of alcohol as a minimum in defining intoxicating liquor was to enable enforcement officials more effectively to carry out the Eighteenth Amendment. Otherwise the question of what was intoxicating liquor would have arisen in numerous cases against violators in such way as to receive varying, contradictory and confusing definitions. Another purpose was to make the permissible alcoholic content in a legitimate beverage so low as to be negligible and non-habit-forming beyond all question. With these objectives in view Congress had ample precedent in establishing the minimum at one-half of 1 per cent.

When the Eighteenth Amendment went into effect thirty-three States had State prohibition. Their experience with methods of enforcement had been such that most of them had set up the one-half of 1 per cent minimum or its virtual equivalent. Furthermore, the Federal Government had adopted this minimum as the most practical line of distinction between intoxicants and non-intoxicants in enforcing Federal laws, including tax laws, relating to the former.

Before Prohibition.

Decades before the arrival of national prohibition the Federal Government exempted near-beer containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol from the taxes levied on fermented intoxicants. In the era preceding national prohibition Congress had exempted beverages containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol from its laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicants in Territories and on Indian lands.

More than one section of the Federal revenue act of 1917 made specific recognition of the half of 1 per cent standard. One section (307) imposed a tax of $1.50 per barrel on malt liquors, such as "beer, lager beer, ale or porter, and other similar fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol," in addition to the tax already in existence.

Another section (308) provided for the removal of malt liquor to a contiguous industrial distillery for recovery of alcohol and manufacture of cereal beverages "containing less than one-half of 1 per centum of alcohol by volume.

Still another section of that act (313b) imposed a tax of 1 cent per gallon on fermented liquors (near-beer) "containing less than one-half of 1 per centum of alcohol." The wide divergence between this tax and the tax on liquors with a greater alcoholic content demonstrated to what extent Congress deemed those above and below the half-of-1-per cent line to differ in nature.

The Federal revenue act of 1919 (Section 608) increased the tax to $6 per barrel on malt liquors "containing one-half of 1 per centum or more of alcohol." It also authorized (Section 618b) the removal of wine from bonded winery premises for use as distilling material with recovery of the spirits and conversion of the residual matter from the still into "non-alcoholic wines containing less than one-half of 1 per centum of alcohol."

Thus it will be seen that the Volstead act introduced nothing new in establishing the half-of-one-per-cent maximum. It followed the experience of many States and the Federal Government in enforcing laws relating to intoxicants. Its power and right to provide this maximum have been specifically sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. What Congress desired to do was to draw a line so clear and unmistakable that anything below it would be harmless beyond question, a line which also would best subserve enforcement purposes. And so Congress in the Volstead act provided that wherever the word "liquor" or the phrase "intoxicating liquor" appeared in that act they should be construed to include any of the liquids mentioned in that measure containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol or more.

II.

The 2.75% Standard.

By LEONIDAS C. DYER, Representative From Missouri.

THE President has invited the attention of the Congress to the difficulties of law enforcement, with special reference to prohibition. I, as a member of Congress, and as one who has served on the Judiciary Committee of the House during the past eighteen years, during which time we have considered and reported the Eighteenth Amendment, the enforcement act and amendments thereto, believe that I am able to suggest a way to aid in the enforcement, and also of temperance. Temperance is the moral issue involved and not prohibition. With this idea, I introduced the bill (HR-2407) known as the 2.75 per cent alcohol by weight, on May 1, 1929, and which is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that Title II, of Section 1, of the National Prohibition act is hereby amended by the addition after the words 'beverage purposes' on line eight of said section of the following:

Provided, that from and after the passage of this act any beverage obtained by the alcoholic fermentation of an infusion or decoction of barley malt, cereals, and hops in drinkable water or by the natural fermentation of apple or other fruit, vegetable, or herb juices containing not more than 2.75 per centum of alcohol by volume may be manufactured, sold, or transported for sale in original packages for consumption in homes and places other than the place of sale.

This proposed legislation does not make any change in the Eighteenth Amendment. It only has to do with the enforcement act, and the only change it would make there would be to authorize in beverages an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight in lieu of one-half of 1 per cent, as now provided in the law. I offer this on the theory that the increased alcoholic content would not make the beverage intoxicating.

Debate in Committee.

My opinion, gained from being a member of the Judiciary Committee, while the proposed Eighteenth Amendment was being considered, was that one-half of 1 per cent was agreed upon because a number of States, in adopting prohibition, prior to the Eighteenth Amendment, had used that figure. We were told that States fixed this percentage to get away from internal revenue laws that treated any malt liquor as subject to tax if it contained more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. I cite the testimony of the late Wayne B. Wheeler, given before a legislative committee at Albany, N. Y., in support of this statement.

Therefore the Congress in fixing one-half of 1 per cent was not governed by the proposition of intoxication. Hence how much further can we go in increasing the alcoholic content without violating the Eighteenth Amendment, which prohibits the manufacture, sale, &c., of intoxicating beverages and liquors?

I believe 2.75 per cent by weight is clearly within the law. The Judiciary Committee of the House has gone into this question quite extensively. In April and May, 1924, we considered it. Among those to give testimony under oath at that time that 2.75 per cent in beverages was not intoxicating were the following:

Dr. Hobart Amory Hare of the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, Dr. John Marshall of the Medical School of the University of Pennsylvania, Dr. Smith Ely Jelliffe, School of Medicine, Columbia University, New York City; Dr. William A. Gies, School of Medicine, Columbia University; Dr. Abraham A. Brill, Physicians and Surgeons' College of New York; Dr. James J. Walsh, Fordham University, New York City; Dr. George W. King, Jersey City, N. J.; Dr. Arthur Perry Haskins, Jersey City, N. J.; Dr. George Elliott Flint, New York City; Dr. Charles A. Rosewater, New York City.

Human Capacity.

These well-known physicians of national reputation all agreed in their sworn testimony that the ordinary human being cannot consume enough of a beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight to cause him to become intoxicated.

In cases that have been before the United States court under the national prohibition act evidence has established the fact by an overwhelming weight of authority that beverages containing not more than 2.75 per cent alcohol by weight are not intoxicating. In Feigenspan v. Bodine (one of the national prohibition cases, 253 U. S. 350) and in Jacob Hoffman Brewing Company v. McElligott, brought in the District Court for the Southern District of New York and taken on appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit (259 Fed. 321), numerous affidavits to that effect were made by distinguished authorities, including physicians, chemists and others.

The evidence was so overwhelming that the government did not even contest the claim that beverages containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight are non-intoxicating, but on the contrary, in the Feigenspan case, expressly admitted that fact on the record.

Upon the question of whether or not the authorization for the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent beverage by weight would be beneficial in the enforcement of the prohibition and other laws, I cite the testimony heretofore obtained from Samuel Gompers, now deceased, who, in 1924, testified before the Judiciary Committee, while president of the American Federation of Labor. He earnestly urged that the prohibition enforcement act be amended to permit the manufacture of 2.75 per cent beverages. He said it would be very helpful to labor and that it would have the effect of causing the laboring people generally to be satisfied with the beer made of this alcoholic content, and that they would not seek strong alcohol drinks, and that labor would help enforce the prohibition law. He said in effect that this change in the law would change the nation from a whisky-drinking one to a light-beer-drinking one.

Similar testimony to this was given before the Judiciary Committee later on by President Green of the American Federation of Labor, who, by reason of the death of Samuel Gompers, had been elected its president.

I might say that the views expressed by Mr. Gompers and Mr. Green have been concurred in most generally by the main labor leaders in the United States. This is also true as to the employers of labor.

In discussing the legislation pending for modification of the prohibition enforcement act, so as to authorize the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent by weight of beverage, I have only touched on two points. The first is whether or not such a beverage could be made within the law, and, second, whether it would be beneficial to the enforeement of the law. It is my desire to confine the discussion to these two points in order that it may have the careful and sane consideration of the people generally, whether they are known as wets or drys.

This proposed legislation does not attack the Eighteenth Amendment, and only seeks to amend the enforcement act, and in doing that to keep within the law. Such legislation would practically do away with the illicit brewing of poorly made beer and of a high alcoholic content. It would put an end to home brewing and give to the people who want it—and there are many—a non-intoxicating beverage, made by scientific and sanitary methods, permits for its manufacture to be issued by the Commissioner of Prohibition.

Medical Opinion.

DR. ARTHUR DEAN BEVAN, Professor of Surgery at Rush Medical College and former president of the American Medical Association, in an address delivered before the State convention of the Illinois Anti-Saloon League on Dec. 20, 1928, said:

"The question as to whether a liquor is intoxicating or not is not a matter of scientific medical opinion at all, but is a matter of common knowledge and common sense. It is a matter of common knowledge that a man could get drunk on the old beer that was manufactured before prohibition, which contained from 3 to 4 per cent of alcohol, and it is a matter of common sense that if a man can get drunk on such beer he can get drunk on beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by drinking a few more glasses or a few more bottles."

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, the food and drug expert, testifying before a committee of the New Jersey Legislature some years ago said:

"In the opinion of our lawmakers a beverage which contains not over one-half of a fluid ounce [of alcohol] per gallon is not considered intoxicating. That, of course, is the legislative point of view. It is a safeguard which is practically effective and with which I have no quarrel, nor will I criticize the wisdom of our lawmakers in putting it so high. That, however, does not in any way weaken the argument that alcohol is a toxic substance.

"It is a wise legislative provision to prevent harm from increasing quantities of this toxic ingredient in beverages, and is a matter which waits for revision or confirmation by the courts. There is no witness whose testimony I have read in this case who denies that alcohol is intoxicating. There is, therefore, some limit which must be set by somebody.

"In regard to the question, Is 2.75 per cent beer intoxicating? I refer to the discussion above. In my opinion I have no doubt of the fact. It may even, as I have seen in my own experience, produce the third state of intoxication, namely drunkenness."

Dr. Vorbeck's Opinion.

Representative Dyer, in his statement on this page, already has cited a roster of doctors who have testified that "the ordinary human being cannot consume enough of a beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight to cause them to become intoxicated." The opinion of Dr. Joseph C. Vorbeck of St. Louis, Mo., stated before the 1924 Congressional committee, may be given:

"I claim that a solution of not over 3 per cent of alcohol is within the physiological limitations of toleration of any human machine," Dr. Vorbeck said. "Therefore, beer at 2.75 or 3 per cent is not intoxicating and is within the physiological limit of toleration, and is uninjurious for that reason."

Many other doctors had been cited by Representative Newton of Missouri as opposing the theory that 2.75 beer was intoxicating during the debates over the passage of the Volstead act in July, 1919. Dr. John Marshall of the University of Pennsylvania was one of these. He was quoted as saying:

"I consider that beer with an alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight is not an intoxicating beverage."

Dr. William J. Gies of Columbia, Dr. Hobart Hare of Jefferson Medical College and Dr. Frank A. McGuire, a visiting prison physician of fifteen years' standing, made practically identical statements based on their laboratory work and medical experience.

IV.

The Debate in 1919.

THE debate over what was the "intoxicating liquor" mentioned in the Eighteenth Amendment raged for many days in Congress when the Volstead act was being considered, in the Summer and Fall of 1919.

The wartime prohibition a[illegible] had already gone into effect on June 30, in spite of President Wilson's veto. The country was already officially dry, but no one knew precisely what the percentage point of aridity was.

By the time Congress began considering the question the nation had become excited over the subject. When the Volstead act—which, it was officially established on the floor of the House, had been written largely by the officers of the Anti-Saloon League, who simply codified the various State dry laws in writing it, and with the active help of the patent medicine interests—came up for consideration both sides had their heavy artillery ready. It was a spectacular battle, and some of the shots fired then are still ringing.

Some excerpts from that long and acrimonious debate which fills countless pages of the Congressional Record are illuminating.

House Committee Report.

The minority members of the Judiciary Committee of the House said, in their report of July 8, 1919, accompanying the three bills to enforce wartime prohibition (with which prohibition has been always tangled) the Eighteenth Amendment and use of industrial alcohol:

"The provisions for the enforcement of the war prohibition act contain a definition of intoxicating liquor which is in effect new legislation. The act of Nov. 21, 1918, prohibited the sale of distilled spirits for beverage purposes and also beer, wine or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage uses. In the recent cases in New York where this statute was construed it was held that only intoxicating beverages were included, and that beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight was within the statute only if intoxicating, which was to be determined as other questions of fact.

"Whether or not the original act of Nov. 21, 1918, can be sustained as valid under the war power, it seems to us that at this date, under the peace conditions that now exist, Congress is wholly without power to extend the prohibition of that act so as to include all beverages which contain in excess of one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol and call them intoxicating."

This report also recalled President Wilson's message to Congress on May 20, 1919, in which he said:

"The demobilization of the military forces has progressed to such a point that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban upon the manufacture and sale of wines and beers," and added:

"Instead of extending the act to include beverages not now included in the prohibition, Congress should at least lift the ban to the extent suggested by the President."

The majority, under Chairman Volstead, in explaining how it had arrived at the definition it had, said in its report:

"In determining what is meant by the phrase 'intoxicating liquor,' Congress has the same power as a court to compare it with prior legislation on the subject and to take notice of the purpose had in mind in passing it. * * * Every State in the Union has in dealing with alcoholic liquors treated all beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol as intoxicating, and has either prohibited their use or subjected them to a heavy tax.

"The National Government has for years imposed a tax upon all alcoholic liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol and thus recognized this distinction between intoxicating and non-intoxicating liquor. This policy has put a legislative construction on the phrase that has become popularly known and thoroughly understood everywhere. No one who supported this amendment had in mind that there could be any question as to the meaning of the term. It meant to them, as it meant to all the people, that all the liquor that has been treated and taxed as intoxicating should forever be banished, and they are asking Congress to carry out in good faith what everybody understood was the mandate written into the Constitution."

With Chairman Volstead as chief defendant, the attack and defense of the definition brought out many diverse comments on the floor of the House.

It was established that Congress had the right to construe the Constitution, and, therefore, that if that Congress had the right to define intoxicating liquor at one-half of 1 per cent, the next Congress might change it to 50 per cent. But the drys said the Supreme Court would not uphold that.

Government Standards.

Representative Dyer denied the contention of Mr. Volstead that "for twenty years the Government of the United States has taxed everything that contained more than one-half of 1 per cent as intoxicating liquor," on the authority of the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who said:

"The standard was not reached at all by considering really whether that was or was not intoxicating," but only as to whether the object of taxation was a beverage or not.

Medical opinion was cited to prove that the use of narcotics would be enormously increased by the passage of the act. It was asserted that the Eighteenth Amendment gave Congress no more power to prohibit beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol than it did to prohibit well-known brands of soft drinks on sale in all drug stores. The Scriptures were quoted, and so were the writings of Samuel Gompers, on behalf of beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. Nevertheless, the Volstead act was finally passed, with the definition prescribed by the Anti-Saloon League included in it.

When in the Autumn of 1919 the "prohibition cases" came to be passed upon by the Supreme Court the matter of the alcoholic limit for beverages received the attention of the court. Justice Van Devanter, announcing the conclusions of the court, which upheld the prohibition amendment and the constitutionality of the Volstead act, had this to say:

"While recognizing that there are limits beyond which Congress cannot go in treating beverages as within its power of enforcement, we think those limits are not transcended by the provisions of the Volstead act wherein liquors containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and fit for use for beverage purposes, are treated as within that power."

This majority opinion of the court was attacked in the dissenting opinion of Justice Clarke.

"It does not require the eye of a seer," he said, in his dissenting opinion, "to see contention at the bar of this court against liberal, paramount, Congressional definition of intoxicating liquor as strenuous and determined as that which we have witnessed over the strict definition of the Volstead act.

"With respect to the eleventh conclusion of the court, it is enough to say that it approves as valid a definition of liquor as intoxicating which is expressly admitted not to be intoxicating in each of the cases in which it is considered. This is deemed warranted, I suppose, as legislation appropriate to the enforcement of the first section, and precedent is found for it in prohibition legislation by States. But I cannot agree that the prohibition of the manufacture, sale, &c., of intoxicating liquors in the first section of the Eighteenth Amendment gives that plenary power over the subject which the Legislatures of the States derive from the people, or which may be derived from the war powers of the Constitution."

½ OF 1 PER CENT

*"THE VOLSTEAD act introduced nothing new in establishing the half-of-one-per-cent maximum. * * * What Congress desired to do was to draw a line so clear and unmistakable that anything below it would be harmless beyond question, a line which also would best subserve enforcement purposes. And so Congress in the Volstead act provided that wherever the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor' appeared in that act they should be construed to include any of the liquids mentioned in that measure containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol or more."*—Senator Sheppard.

2.75 PER CENT

*"THEREFORE, the Congress in fixing one-half of 1 per cent was not governed by the proposition of intoxication. Hence, how much further can we go in increasing the alcoholic content without violating the Eighteenth Amendment, which prohibits the manufacture, sale, &c., of intoxicating beverages and liquors? * * * I believe 2.75 per cent by weight is clearly within the law. * * * Physicians of national reputation all agreed in their sworn testimony that the ordinary human being cannot consume enough of a beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight to cause him to become intoxicated."*—Representative Dyer.

HOOVER, A HUGHES —AND SOME OTHERS

A Few Footnotes on Some Personalities Whose Names Have Appeared in the Headlines

By S. T. WILLIAMSON.

A LOT of people during the past week did not need to go to an aquarium to find sailfish, sharks, barracuda, groupers, Spanish mackerel and such; they found them in the headlines. And when fish figure in headlines these days it is a fairly good sign that President Hoover is catching them, or has hopes.

It appears to make little difference what the fish are, as long as they are fish. Anything from trout to sharks, it seems, goes with him. About the President is no fish snobbery. He is not one of those fussy brook trout fishermen who pretend that ocean fishing is mere manual labor. Nor does he have the salt water man's contempt for the fly fisher's flimsy gear. Tossing waves or rippling mountain streams—wherever he may be, the President is a fisherman.

If the President could have his way probably one immortal line of the Declaration of Independence would be revised to "life, liberty and the pursuit of fish." Perhaps Mr. Hoover would change another expression: what the Governor of one of the Carolinas said to the Governor of the other would be, "It's a long time between bites." When Mr. Hoover chose engineering and public service for careers the publishers were cheated of a nature writer of a high order. A few of the President's extemporaneous speeches and a magazine article or two have shown what he could do in this direction. Consider these composite extracts from some of them:

"There are several million plans current for the occupation of the increasing leisure which most of our people have. Every one has a particular brand of joy ready for national consumption. I am for fishing because it gives an impulse to take to the woods and to the water.

"I assure you that the increase of crime is due to a lack of those qualities of mind and character which impregnate the soul of every fisherman except those who get no bites. The fishing beatitudes are much amplified since Izaak Walton, for he did not spend his major life answering a bell. He never got the 'jumps' from traffic signals or the price of wheat. Association with the placid ripples of the waves and the quiet chortles of the streams is soothing to our 'het up' anxieties of life.

"Fishing is an excuse and a valid reason for temporary retreat from our busy world. I find that many Presidents have joined the ranks of fishermen after their inauguration as President, although I can claim over forty-five years of apprenticeship—that is, in fishing, not the Presidency. I have discovered why Presidents take to fishing, the silent sport. Fishing seems to be the sole avenue left to Presidents through which they may escape to their own thoughts and may live in their own imaginings and find relief from the pneumatic hammer of personal contacts. It is desirable that the President of the United States should be periodically reminded of this fundamental fact: That the forces of nature discriminate for no man. Moreover, it is a constant reminder of the democracy of life, of humility and of human frailty—for all men are equal before fishes.

"As I have said in another place, it is generally recognized that prayer is the most personal of all human relationships. Next to prayer, fishing is the most personal relationship of man, and, of more importance than the fact itself, everybody concedes that the fish will not bite in the presence of the public and the press."

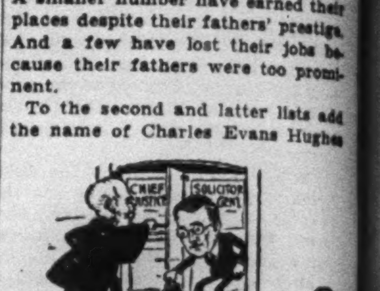
MANY young men with eminent parents have been thrust into important positions merely because their fathers were influential. A smaller number have earned their places despite their fathers' prestige. And a few have lost their jobs because their fathers were too prominent.

To the second and latter lists add the name of Charles Evans Hughes



Jr. A year ago President Hoover appointed him Solicitor General of the United States on his merits and not because he is the son of Charles Evans Hughes—in fact, the elder Hughes did not know that his son was being considered for the place. When Mr. Hughes was nominated Chief Justice of the United States the Solicitor General, who appears for the Federal Government in the Supreme Court, was compelled to resign or else occupy the questionable position of pleading a case before his father.

From the professional standpoint, at least, and economically, the younger Hughes lost more when he entered government service than when he left it. As a practicing member of his father's firm he represented many an important client—including the Interborough, which has been more successful with lawyers than it has with platform guards.

It is perhaps too strong a statement to say that much of the professional success of Hughes the younger has been despite Hughes the elder rather than because of him; but Charles Evans Hughes Jr. has kept to the shadows and has been most careful not to do anything that could cause even whispered accusations of trading upon his father's name. This was evident in his college career. He attended his father's university—Brown—and, like his father, earned a Phi Beta Kappa key. At the Harvard Law School he was elected editor of The Law Review, which is the highest academic honor in that institution. In military service he distinguished himself by his self-effacement. He was at Plattsburgh when his father was nominated for the Presidency, and the news was brought to him when he was policing company streets of paper and litter. When the United States entered the World War he might have claimed exemption from the draft as a married man and a father. Instead, he went to Camp Upton as a private and soon was regimental sergeant major of the 305th Field Artillery. This was the highest rank in the regiment that an enlisted man could hold. The highest commissioned rank in the regiment was held by Colonel Henry L. Stimson, now Secretary of State.

The junior Hughes is 41 and wears big round glasses which give him an appearance of frigid solemnity that he does not possess. His favorite hobby is music—symphony concerts and opera—and as a piano player he can do more than merely turn a switch and follow directions on a perforated roll. The reading tastes of the two Hugheses cover most of publishers' present offerings, for the father turns to detective stories, while the son prefers biography.

AND now Death Valley Scotty, that strong-voiced, ready-spending desert character, has admitted that the source of his mysterious wealth is not an inaccessible gold mine in dry, ovenlike Death Valley but the generosity of a Chi-

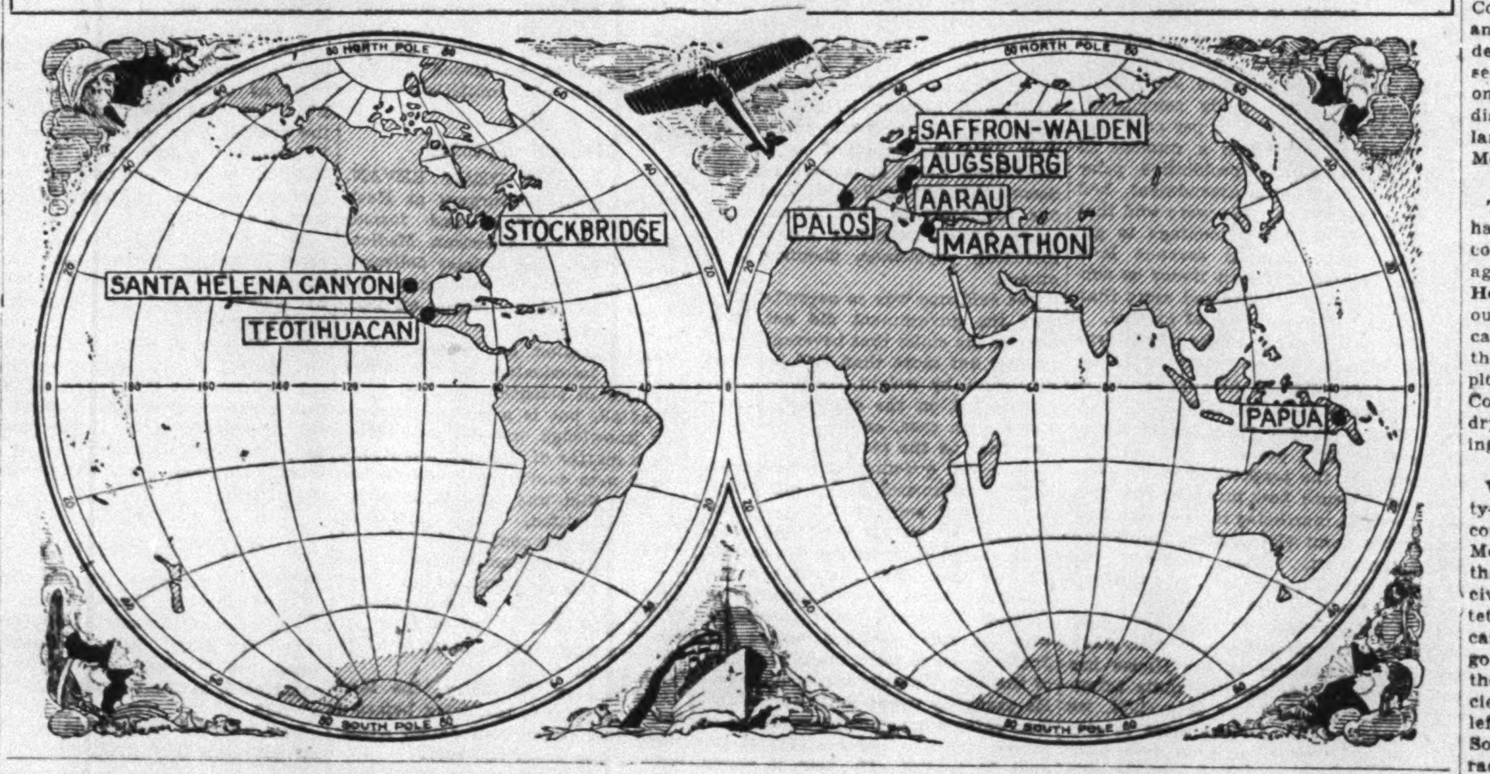
Mr. Johnson found there not only health but a unique character—Death Valley Scotty, the "Hermit of the Funeral Mountains." When Scotty appeared in civilization with rolls of bills and an ambition for spectacular entertainment, men roamed through Death Valley vainly seeking his supposed gold mine.

Mr. Johnson believes in the educative value of puzzles, however. Five years ago he declared that the cross-word puzzle craze was responsible for a 25 per cent increase in efficiency of several hundred stenographers in his organization. Mr. Johnson's approval of puzzles may have increased the vocabularies of his employes, but the effect upon vocabularies of Death Valley prospectors has been disappointing.

FROM AARAU AND MARATHON TO PALOS AND TEOTIHUACAN

INTERESTING PLACES IN THE NEWS OF THE WORLD



AT the place where, more than twenty centuries ago, the Greeks turned back the Persian horde in one of the three battles which kept Europe safe from the "barbarians" of Asia, a modern dam has been built and a magic word in ancient history recalled. Further north an important religious event of the Middle Ages is to be commemorated. Art treasures bring out other places in the news, while archaeological expeditions continue to make valuable discoveries.

A New York company recently completed a modern dam to impound the water supply of Athens, Greece. This was the Marathon dam at the place where, in 490 B. C., Miltiades with his Athenians and their faithful allies stemmed the tide of the Persian invasion. Here

The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marthon looks on the sea.

Thus the Greeks watched the hosts of Xerxes disembark and, when the time was ripe, rolled down the hillside like an avalanche, driving the Persian hosts into the sea or the two marshes of Marathon. As Lord Byron puts it,

The flying Mede, his shaftless broken bow;
The fiery Greek, his red pursuing spear;
Death in the front, Destruction in the rear!

The St. Olaf Choir of Northfield, Minn., is to take part in the 400th anniversary of the Augsburg Confession next September at the city of Augsburg, Germany. Here Charles V held the Diet of 1530, at which the Protestant princes presented to the Emperor and estates the Confession, a reformed creed framed by Melanchthon. Augusta Vindelicorum was founded by the Romans in the year 9. The town reached the height of its prosperity in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The Fugger family of Augsburg, the Rothschilds of the sixteenth century, raised themselves within 100 years from the condition of poor weavers to that of the wealthiest merchants in the world.

The old Guelph art treasure, according to dispatches from Switzerland, is now deposited at an unnamed bank at Aarau to be catalogued and evaluated before being offered for sale. Aarau, lying on the right bank of the Aare at the foot of the Jura, has many other treasures. Its Cantonal Library possesses 100,000 volumes, many incunabula, and 500 manuscripts (missals from the convents of Muri and Wettingen; Zwingli's Bible with original notes).

A precious drinking bowl, or mazer, from which Samuel Pepys drank in 1659, was recently sold at Saffron-Walden, England, by the trustees of the Edward IV Almshouses in order to obtain funds for a nurses' home. An American, it is said, bought the art treasure for more than $22,500. This old town was named from the saffron crocus, which was formerly cultivated there. It was the birthplace of William Strachey, author of "The History of Travaile into Virginia" (1612). Near by was born Dick Turpin, the famous highwayman.

An old Indian mission house, built in 1740 at Stockbridge, Mass., is to be dedicated as a memorial to Joseph H. and Caroline Sterling Choate. Mr. Choate, formerly dean of the New York bar and once Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, died in 1917 and is buried on his "plantation" on Prospect Hill. Stockbridge, a wealthy village beautifully situated on the Housatonic meadows, has been a favorite resort for literary and artistic people since the times when Jonathan Edwards preached there to the Indians. North of the town is Lake Mahkeenac, or Stockbridge Bowl, set in the midst of hills and surrounded by magnificent villas. To the west is Monument Mountain, which, as Bryant says,

"seems a fragment of some mighty wall,
Built by the hand that fashioned the old world,
To separate its nations."

The Norwegian ship Roald Amundsen, built like the craft in which Leif Ericson and his men are supposed to have reached Labrador, sailed recently from Palos, Spain, to follow the ocean trail blazed by Columbus and the Pinta, the Niña, and the Santa Maria. Little Palos de Moguer was once an important seaport. Here Columbus landed on Aug. 3, 1493, after his voyage of discovery, and here also Cortez landed in 1528 after his conquest of Mexico.

Traces of the basket-makers, who had a civilization in the Big Bend country of Texas about 4,000 years ago, were recently found at Santa Helena Canyon by an expedition sent out by the University of Texas. This canyon was cut 1,800 feet deep by the Rio Grande, and is in the unexplored region between Brewster County and Mexico. The region is dry and partly given over to ranching and mining.

Within the past few months twenty-five new pyramids have been discovered in the Valley of Teotihuacán, Mexico, strengthening the theory that this region was the cradle of civilization. Teotihuacán (Aztec; teteo meaning gods, hua, having, and can, meaning place; "place of the gods") was a sacrosanct place in the theogony and cosmogony of the ancient Nahoas. These unknown people left behind them, from Yucatan to Sonora, and in Arizona and Colorado, stupendous ruins—ruins which awed Cortez and his Spaniards four centuries ago.

Cannibals who a few years ago were eating human beings in the jungles of Papua, or New Guinea, now, according to a dispatch from Canberra, Australia, have Boy Scouts among them who do a good deed every day. Much have they changed, it would seem, for early sailors who visited the Papuans described them as a fierce and intractable race of savages. Captain Cook, who landed in Dutch New Guinea in 1770, said the natives threw "darts, very ill-made of the reed or bamboo cane."

NEW YORK'S THREE BILLION DOLLAR BUSINESS

A Picture of the City's Huge Financial Transactions and the Legal Safeguards That Surround the Collection of Taxes and the Expenditure of Funds

By MILDRED ADAMS.

CHICAGO wails that it cannot pay its school teachers, Berlin admits cracks in the steel walls of its treasury, half a dozen small towns pass the hat in order to meet their most pressing debts. And citizens from Staten Island up to the Westchester line wonder whether anything similar is likely to happen to New York.

It takes some such catastrophe to make as technical a subject as municipal finances into a pressing matter of public interest. Usually they concern only the officials delegated to handle them, and a few committee chairmen in civic organizations who act as unofficial watch-dogs.

The ordinary citizen is conscious only in May and November that municipal finance exists. Those are the months when taxes are due. Then he grumbles at the value placed on his property, and grumbles at standing in a long line to pay out hard-earned dollars. Otherwise he knows vaguely that in some mysterious way money goes in and out of the city treasury, leaving traces of its passing in the form of subway excavations and creaking buses, fire engines, school buildings and a new copy of "Alice in Wonderland" on the library shelves.

The Public's Attitude.

The amount that is handled, the way in which it comes in and goes out, the safeguards set up to keep the city from falling into Chicago's morass of near-bankruptcy are matters he leaves contentedly to experts. Scholars aspiring to be doctors of philosophy write theses about them. Committees study them for years, and issue reports of 400 closely written pages.

The details are so intricate and complicated that a whole army of accountants works year in and year out to keep them straight. The budget alone provides for 3,700 separate appropriations, and fills a volume longer and wider and twice as thick as the Manhattan telephone book. Yet if you can stand far enough away from the details, the financial structure as a whole looms up like a skyscraper whose vast bulk and broad outlines impress even the most casual beholder.

The city itself has been called a public service corporation, but it is organized for mutual benefit rather than for profit. Put in the simplest way, its transactions consist in rendering the service its citizens demand, and charging the cost to them in the form of a tax on their real estate and their personal property. Streets for their traveling, sewers to carry off waste, protection for their homes against fire and theft, education for their children, medical treatment for those who are poor, parks and museums and libraries for every one—these are only part of the service which this great municipality renders its people.

It used almost $3,000,000,000 in the process last year. That was the turnover of the city's treasury—$1,423,479,466 taken in and added to cash balances of nearly $49,000,000; $1,416,127,812 paid out and leaving cash balances of $56,000,000 on Dec. 31 with which to start the new year.

Of the amount of money it took in, $628,790,731 was actual income. The rest, $794,688,735, was money borrowed so that the business of the city might go along at its regular pace and major improvements be made.

Of the $628,790,731 of actual income, three-fourths came in from taxes and assessments collected with them. The rest came from the most varied sources. The State handed over some $37,000,000 to help pay school teachers' salaries, and men were fined $2 apiece for smoking in the subway. Real estate the city did not need was sold for more than $4,000,000, and pushcarts on Grand Street each paid $1 a week. Every time you drank a glass of water or washed your hands, rode on a ferryboat or played croquet in a Brooklyn park, you were helping to bring in that $628,000,000.

Enough came in from prospective bridegrooms who bought marriage licenses to run the Aquarium and leave a substantial sum for fish food. Somebody paid the city for the privilege of refrigerating Washington Market, where fresh fruits and vegetables spend a hectic night on their way to chain stores and breakfast nooks. The city sold school lunches and animals that multiplied too fast for the zoo's accommodations. It took people riding in buses and trolley cars, for a consideration it let them play golf and go swimming, sell ice and run dance halls and bowling alleys. And because there are five prosperous boroughs full of potential customers for all these things, the money which dribbled in by nickels and dimes and dollars mounted to the hundreds of millions.

But even taxes and assessments were not enough to pay the cost of running New York, and the city had to borrow to make up the difference. It does two kinds of borrowing, the first for short periods, to tide it over the time when bills are due and funds are temporarily low; the second for long periods in order to finance such major public improvements as subways, bridges and school buildings.

Short and Long Term Loans.

The first type may be for only a few days and is secured by notes or short-term bonds. For instance, in the first months of each fiscal year the cash in the treasury is low. The first tax payments do not come in until May, the most important of them frequently hang over until November. Yet, in spite of the fact that the funds are low, there are regular costs which must be met—salaries, for example, which must be paid every week and every month. The city knows it will have plenty of money later on, but for a short time it must go out and borrow. Sometimes it borrows from pension or sinking funds, sometimes from the public by way of the bankers.

The other type of borrowing is of the long-term variety, done only when important improvements are to be financed. The floating of $300,000,000 worth of bonds for the construction of subways, which the city by special dispensation was allowed to do in 1927, was of this kind. This long-term borrowing is hedged about by the most careful, not to say meticulous, safeguards. The amount that can be borrowed is limited to 10 per cent of the city's taxable real estate. The way in which it is borrowed is prescribed. The very Constitution of the State must be changed before this amount can be increased. Every possible barrier has been set up to forestall any slightest chance of the city's going into debt too far for safety.

A Margin for Debt.

As a matter of fact, the city has shown little inclination to walk too close to the edge. At the present time there is a margin of $375,000,000 of debt-incurring power which is not being used at all. Yet the city's bonded debt, whose manner of handling is also carefully prescribed by law, had reached almost to the $2,000,000,000 point on Dec. 31, 1929. Its funding, its amortization and the care and cost of it are as regular a part of the city finances as is the debt of the nation, or the mortgage that modern skyscrapers carry as a regular part of their running expenses.

The amount of the city's income is, within certain legal restrictions, determined by the total of the expenditures it thinks will be necessary. In order to adjust each to the other it plays a formal little game with itself. Each year it sets solemnly to work to make up a budget of what it will need for the ensuing year, in order that it may know how much tax to demand. At the same time it decides what its property is worth so as to know on what it can levy taxes. The Board of Aldermen, in public session that is frequently acrimonious, adopts the budget presented by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, more or less modified by its own ideas of proper economy. This budget is a compilation of the 3,700 separate appropriations asked for and allowed to the various city departments.

But the tax rate is not adjusted exactly to meet this planned expenditure, for if this were attempted it would make the rate illegally high. At this critical moment a good fairy enters in the form of the General Fund for the Reduction of Taxation. This is made up of all the fines and fees and forfeitures, receipts from the sale of maps and transcripts and discarded ferry boats, license money from newspaper kiosks, moneys from the State "and from other sources under prevailing laws." In 1929 it all amounted to $94,500,000. Solemnly it is deducted from the amount of the tax budget, and what is left, divided by the total assessed value, gives the 2 and a fraction per cent which is the basic tax rate.

What the city paid out in 1929 amounted to $1,416,127,812.03, several millions less than what was received by way of income and borrowings. Only a fraction of it went for those regular running expenses of city departments which in the budget had been estimated at $538,000,000. The rest was loans paid back, and money spent for long term major improvements. There was $601,000,000 paid out to redeem the short term bonds that the city had given as security for its twenty or thirty day borrowings, and some of this was money borrowed and paid back two or three times, and counted each time it went through the treasury. There was an item of ninety-odd millions for rapid transit, which in this case meant new subways. Charged to the year 1929, they would go on being a major improvement for many decades. There was some $38,000,000 for docks and the water supply. New schools in several neighborhoods took fat chunks of the total, and were a permanent improvement.

Out of that total of $1,416,127,812 that passed through the Controller's hands, the biggest slice, $180,000,000, went for educational purposes—for the building and the running of schools and colleges and libraries. The next biggest, $171,000,000, is credited to interest, amortization, and that phrase strongly reminiscent of Sunday school days, redemption of debt. The smallest amount included in Controller Berry's official summary of expenditure went to construct and equip the new municipal airport.

The thirty-three items listed in that summary are large and imposing general headings which sound somehow like the accounts of supermen, and give no hint of the human problems, the struggles and tragi-comedies and farces that lie beneath them. Health, for instance, which cost $30,000,000, is a suave and noble item which gives little indication of the bawling babies weighed and measured, the thermometers stuck under tiny tongues, the long rows of white hospital beds which are constantly needing new sheets. Under the title "Executive" are hidden all the accompaniments and appurtenances of his Honor the Mayor. He has directly responsible to him a Director of the Budget, an assistant, a secretary, an executive secretary, an assistant secretary, a confidential stenographer, two executive stenographers, a special investigator, a chief clerk, nine people called starkly "clerks," four who are both "stenographer and typewriter," an accountant, a telephone operator, and two chauffeur attendants. The salaries of all these people and of Grover Whalen's policemen, the cost of cleaning streets and putting out fires, of lighting the City Hall, taking care of Grant's Tomb, feeding the yaks and buying bird seed for the crested grosbeak in the zoo, all hide within the total $1,400,000,000.

The city took in $7,351,654 more than it paid out last year, which left it with a cautious and comfortable cash balance on hand in its treasury and its sinking funds. This is a source of surprised bewilderment to people who think that a city should be able to estimate its expenditures in advance to the smallest penny. Yet the estimate, like the estimated budget of any family, can only be made on the basis of past experience. Always emergencies arise, and more money is needed or less money spent. It would be a superhuman housewife who could figure exactly what her family would spend in the coming year with all the unknown factors of heat and cold, possible strikes which would raise the price of coal, possible droughts which might put potatoes almost beyond her reach, little Johnny's temper and its possible result in broken teeth and dentist bills, Mary's rate of growth and the percentage of havoc due to changing styles.

Budget Uncertainties.

In the same way, it would be a superhuman Board of Estimate and Apportionment which could foresee exactly what the city must spend for running expense, interest on money borrowed, and to make the improvements which are necessary each year that the city lives and grows. The ways of a growing girl with skirt lengths are nothing to the ways of a growing city with transportation lines and schools. The factors of heat and cold and accident which puzzle an ordinary family are magnified a millionfold in the city's calculations. Not even the most foresighted city father can be sure how much money the Street Cleaning Department will need, for no one knows whether a Winter will be open or all the blizzards of Medicine Hat will choke the long avenues and the narrow cross streets. Wages may go up or down, interest rates on borrowed money be high or low, public buildings need sudden repairs or actual replacements, and the whole face of things be changed. The courts may, as they did in 1922, declare one item of income unconstitutional, and leave the Finance Department to scurry around and find wherewithal to feed hungry departmental mouths.

The item of "debt service," which bobs up like a particularly large ghost whenever any one writes or talks about city finances, is really a memory of past improvements and a forecast of future ones. The city has been borrowing money since the time it needed more shillings and pounds than it had on hand to pay for docks and public buildings, and to buy muskets for use against the British.

Whether or not the latter might be classed as "permanent improvements" is something of a question, but the fact remains that the payment of this very early debt was put off and put off, until the Legislature in 1812 set up the first sinking fund. This was, as its name indicates, a pool into which funds were to be sunk until enough had accumulated to retire the bonds and pay off the debt. But before that happy day was reached the city had borrowed again, this time to build markets and to buy Blackwell's Island. Bit by bit, borrowing became part of its regular habit of life, and now it is as usual a part of the city financing as is the borrowing of a large business corporation. Incidentally, New York has kept the old English phrase "corporate stock" for the name of the bonds it gives in return for money loaned, and one may hold stock in the city in which one lives just as one holds stock in the telephones one uses or the railroads on which one rides.

The position of the "corporate stock," which in modern terminology must be called bonds, is the most sure and unbiased index of the city's financial standing. Not the report of the City Chamberlain, nor the deliberations of the Board of Estimate, nor the Controller's statement of moneys received and moneys spent is as significant as the fact that New York can borrow money from outside commercial sources at exceptionally low rates, and that the bonds it gives in return, except those to be paid from assessments, are listed by a conservative authority as "Class AAA" investments. One of the great New York banks, in advertising a recent issue of them, spoke of "the prestige of New York City, together with its established resources for payment and its charter's safe-guarding provisions" and called the corporate stock "a rock-ribbed security."

Checks on Expenditures.

It is to such outside opinions as this that the Controller points with pride when he is questioned as to whether New York might conceivably be caught in the recent epidemic of municipal near-bankruptcy. Even if the bodies that have the city's finances in charge went on a sudden spending spree, even if the Board of Estimate forgot its high responsibilities and recommended a budget that included everything that everybody asked for, even if the Board of Aldermen so far forgot its duty to its constituents and the dangers of coming elections as to pass such a budget, the Constitution of the State of New York would step in and stop the orgy. For the safeguards against bankruptcy consist not only in the fact that there is only one body which can authorize expenditures. There are checks and balances set up by law to guard against undue zeal in the authorizing of expenditures, provisions that the annual budget cannot amount to more than 2 per cent of the assessed value of the taxable realty within the city, that the sinking funds must be kept in a certain way, that even the longest-term improvements cannot amount to more than 10 per cent of the city's taxable real estate.

Controller Berry, in a recent report, listed the safeguards as follows:

1. No obligation can be legally incurred in excess of the amount appropriated therefor.
2. The annual budget is obliged by constitutional limitations to bear a direct relation to the value of taxable real estate within the city limits.
3. Provision is made in every annual budget for any deficiencies in the tax revenues on account of unpaid or uncollectable taxes.
4. The assessed valuation of the taxable real estate is less than the actual sale value of the property.
5. The sinking funds of the city, established pursuant to law for the redemption of the city's debt, are in excellent condition. At present they have a surplus of over $36,000,000 in excess of actual requirements.
6. Only one body, the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, has power to authorize expenditures. Only one board, the Department of Taxes and Assessments, has authority to assess property for taxable purposes.
7. Every constitutional or statutory limitation is observed to the letter.

And his inevitable conclusion, carrying comfort to citizens alarmed by Chicago's plight, was "New York City can never go bankrupt."

SITE OF WASHINGTON ABODE UNCOVERED AT WEST POINT

Old Maps and Traditions Lead to Location of House Where He Forbade Swearing

WHERE Washington made his military home at West Point from June until November, 1779, where the famous indictment against profanity was composed and delivered to his army, and where many conferences were held, is now only a wooded land. Only the name is there to remind our generation that once upon a time our first General made his headquarters here. It is called Washington's Valley.

Located in the middle of a little cape at the end of Washington's Valley, north of a tiny cove which itself is north of jutting West Point, two rippling streams murmur in siege of the spot where Washington made his headquarters and where only a few stones remain. An overgrown winding road can be made out running beside the site of the house. Beyond is a herb cellar and further toward the river are the remains of a stone wall. The narrow, Colonial road comes out of the hills back of West Point and extends in one direction to New Windsor and in the other to Central Valley. The two streams feed into the Hudson River, coming down out of the mountains back of Fort Putnam and Crow's Nest.

The Evidence.

Beyond occasional meager reference and ancient maps, recollection alone is the full record of Washington's life there. A few scrawly maps and infrequent sentences in historical memoirs prove the traditions and legends. Connecting all the evidence scattered among many works and maps, it is found that a man named Moore built a house in a valley that ended at a point of land north of West Point; he built it near the water's edge and between two babbling brooks. The house was pretentious for that day, but it became trebly important early in 1779 when Washington informed Moore that he would make it his central headquarters during his frequent trips to West Point. In those days it was called the "Red House" and also "Moore's Folly."

Disturbing the birds the searcher labored among the undergrowth in his task of locating the site of the house. He was rewarded by finding the exact place named by maps and accounts and unmistakable remains of the cobblestoned foundations of an old house. The searcher had depended mainly on the memory of Sergeant Lewis of the engineer detachment of the Military Academy and upon the research of Major Carswell of the academy staff of instructors.

Legends have persisted in the family of Sergeant Lewis, whose father and grandfather personally knew of the "Red House," and possibly Grandfather Lewis, while playing hooky from school, hid for the day in its ruins.

But, alas for the shades of traditional history and the spirit of ancient romance! it must be added that during the construction of the West Shore Railroad and later, when a huge slice was taken out of the plateau jutting into the river, compelling a curve in the rail line, gangs of laborers overran the land upon which Washington's abode was located. In excavating many accumulations of later years had to be moved before coming upon the real discovery—the foundations of Moore's house.

South of the site of Washington's headquarters is the slight promontory known as West Point and formerly called Gee's Point. On Jan. 20, 1778, General Parsons's brigade crossed the river and landed on the rocks at this point—the same spot where Henry Hudson anchored on Sept. 14, 1609. When Parsons landed, the weather was severe.

Just across the river from Washington's Valley stands the house once the retreat of Benedict Arnold. It contained a desk, now presented to the Military Academy, upon which Arnold put on paper his treasonable writings. Fireplaces, redoubts, parapets still remain to tell of Revolutionary days.

Washington had good reasons for making West Point his headquarters. Early in the Revolution he appreciated the importance of controling the Hudson River. Constitution Island, originally known as Martelair's Rock, was fortified beginning in 1775, but the project was severely criticized, and Bernard Romans, the engineer who constructed the works, was blamed for subsequent failures. Work was started in an effort to fortify West Point in 1778, but not until after General Clinton's raid up the Hudson had destroyed Forts Montgomery, Clinton and the works on Constitution Island. This first Fort Clinton was located six miles down the river from West Point and was not that of which the ruins are still to be seen at the Military Academy. The British would have held to this conquest had not the Americans been successful at Saratoga.

RA OUER TOMB THE LARGEST EVER UNEARTHED IN EGYPT

Eleven Other Burial Places in the Vicinity Promise to Yield Treasures of Their Own

EGYPT'S latest archaeological disclosure is the largest burial chamber as yet unearthed beside the River Nile. Reports from the excavations at the foot of the Sphinx, not far from Cairo, tell of the opening of a great mastaba, or oblong tomb, two stories in height, 500 feet long and 100 feet wide—a palace of the dead containing 80 compartments and 30 labyrinths. It is the final resting place of Ra Ouer, "intimate friend of the King, master of the royal robes, master of ceremonies, barber of the King, well beloved of the King."

The new excavation is the first spectacular achievement of an expedition recently sent out by the Egyptian University under the direction of the native Egyptologist, Selim Bey Hassan. Ra Ouer's is one of twelve tombs the expedition has found to be in the neighborhood of the Pyramids and from which great treasures are expected.

A sample of the riches promised is an enameled necklace containing 4,000 gold and lapis lazuli beads, said to be the largest necklace ever discovered in Egypt. But for a fortunate accident, this would have gone the way of so much of the wealth buried with the ancient Egyptians—it would have been taken by grave robbers. A skeleton, with the hand missing, found beside a mummy's coffin, is taken to be that of a thief arrested by the fall of heavy masonry as he was making off with the jewelry.

The tomb of Ra Ouer is the second of unusual proportions that the Nile Valley has revealed of late. The other was the reward of the University of Pennsylvania's first expedition, at Meydum, some fifty miles further up the river. The University of Pennsylvania group is engaged in investigating the "false pyramid" of Seneferu, the first really great King of Egypt, which was the third of the great pyramids to be completed and now occupies a position in the midst of the sixty-mile stretch of royal cemetery on the west bank of the Nile.

With a human chain to pass up the débris accumulated through 5,000 years, and progressing only as fast as safety allowed in the foul inclosed air, the excavators came upon a great chamber of evenly laid stones measuring 320 feet by 160, with forty individual graves, their rectangular coffins thought to date mostly from the Fourth Dynasty. According to a report in January, twenty sarcophagi had already been taken out.

The discoveries, eight years ago, in connection with the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen served to fix the public mind on the excavation work that goes forward in ancient Egypt. But discoveries had been made before. The tide of European antiquity-collecting turned with full force upon Egypt in the nineteenth century.

Howard Carter, the finder of King Tut-ankh-Amen's tomb, has spent forty years in the Valley of the Kings seeking out the remains of monarchs of thousands of years ago and the accompanying objects by which the life of their period is to be reconstructed. For six years he searched all Luxor for the boy King before that day in 1922 when the removal of a boulder near the mouth of the valley showed him that his search had been rewarded. It was he who had already revealed the tomb of Thothmes IV, the valley temple of Hatshepshu, the tomb of Amenhotep I, the cemetery of the eighteenth dynasty queens and the cliff tomb of Queen Hatshepshu.

Among Egypt's Tombs.

From the beginning of the twentieth century, agents of universities and museums in England, America and Germany and private explorers have busied themselves among the tombs of Egypt. Before the World War the German Oriental Society did distinguished work in the Nile country.

The Metropolitan Museum of Art has been engaged in Egyptian excavations for twenty-three years. Thebes, on the upper Nile, has been the scene of its major activities, among the tombs of nobles and the ruins of palaces dating from 1600 to 1200 B. C. It has practically finished its work on the Temple of Mentuhotep and the cemetery to the north.

Last year it reported the discovery of the tomb of Queen Meryet-Amun, daughter of Thothmes III and wife of his successor, Amenhotep II, dating from about 1440 B. C.

The territory that has been worked over for the last few years by the Harvard-Boston Museum expedition adjoins that in which Ra Ouer's tomb is situated, in the neighborhood of the pyramids of Gizeh. Its outstanding find is the tomb of Queen Hetepheres, wife of Seneferu and mother of Cheops, builder of the great pyramid, which was opened in 1926. It is thought that Queen Hetepheres's tomb was originally elsewhere and that it had been broken into.

A SURVEY OF AMERICA'S FAR-FLUNG "EMPIRE"

It Extends From the Philippines to Caribbean Isles, Giving Us A Profitable Trade but Entailing Heavy Responsibilities

By HENRY KITTREDGE NORTON.

FRANCE released recently to the world a weighty memorandum in which she set forth her naval requirements. Many Americans perused this solemn document with knitted brows, but their faces broke into an amused smile as they came to a reference to France's "colonial empire spread out over the whole surface of the earth." Had France forgotten, in the enthusiasm of the moment, that she was a republic and that republics do not have empires?

Perhaps so. But the French are reputedly more realistic than we, and perhaps the Foreign Office was simply recognizing realities and using an appropriate word to designate them. This difference in attitude may help to account for the not infrequent references in the French press to "American imperialism" and our rather irritated resentment at what we consider an "unfounded charge."

We insist that we have no "empire." Well-bred republics do not concern themselves with such things. And certainly we are conscious of no yearning for "imperialistic conquest." And yet . . . ! There is a Filipino commission in our midst pleading for independence for the Philippines. President Hoover has just appointed a commission to study our responsibilities in Hayti. Porto Rico's problems engage a fleeting attention. And our relations with Cuba, or the form of government in Samoa, now and again demand at least a passing notice.

We prefer not to think of the United States as possessing an "empire." But if we adopt for a moment the point of view of outsiders, we find we have a very substantial one. In area the extent of our overseas rule is less than that of Britain or France. It is almost equal to that of Belgium or Portugal. And it is considerably larger than that of the Netherlands, Italy or Japan. The British, the French and the Dutch rule more people. The Japanese rule about the same number as we do. While all of the other empires are less than half as populous as ours, in commercial value only the British empire exceeds our own. Even the French empire brings less than one-third of the trade to the mother country that comes to us from the countries where our sovereignty is paramount.

"Manifest Destiny."

This takes no account of our continental expansion and the acquisition of territories which are now States of the Union. Since the Declaration of Independence we have brought in to our national boundaries an area half as large again as our original domain by a process which we chose to call "manifest destiny," but which other peoples, not endowed with our capacity for making such fine distinctions, perversely insist upon referring to as "imperialism." This process began with the Louisiana purchase in 1803, was followed by Spain's most unwilling cession of Florida and other territories in 1819, by the annexation of Texas in 1845 and of Oregon in the following year, then by the absorption of about half of Mexico's territory in 1848, and was completed by the Gadsden purchase in 1853.

That rounded out our national domain in accord with the dictates of "manifest destiny." The process was similar in its essentials to that by which most great nations have been built up. As all of this territory is now organized into States and —despite the objections of Senator Grundy—participates on equal terms in the conduct of the National Government, the charge of "imperialism" is fairly refutable so far as it is concerned. Our later destiny is not so "manifest."

Our first overseas venture was the Alaska purchase in 1867. Secretary Seward gave Russia $7,200,000 for this northern area half as large as the original territories of the United States. Its commerce last year was $102,000,000. Organized as a "territory," it enjoys many of the advantages of Statehood. Its 60,000 people elect their own officials and practically rule themselves except for a Governor who is appointed by the President.

It was thirty years before we moved outward again. Then the Spanish-American War prompted a final decision on Hawaii. A precocious commodore had raised the American flag in Honolulu away back in 1840, but his action was disavowed by the government. It served to notify other countries that we were interested, however, and one by one they relinquished their ambitions.

Hawaii has only some 6,000 square miles of land, but the population is 350,000. Its annual commerce runs close to $190,000,000. Like the Alaskans, the Hawaiians have a territorial form of government, elect all their officials except their Governor. Even the Governor, though an appointee of the President, must be a resident of the islands.

The Spanish War.

The Spanish War took us into the empire business on a much larger scale. The treaty of peace left us with Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines and Guam on our hands. Where we had formerly dealt with thousands of people, we were now responsible for millions. And not people of our own kind, either, but sons of another race, speaking other languages. After a bitter and somewhat fantastic debate between "imperialists" and "anti-imperialists," we settled down to our new responsibilities. As we had no trained administrative officers except those of the army and navy, we left them in charge of our new possessions.

Since then we have extended our political or administrative control in various forms. We have passed laws and issued orders to meet particular situations. We have solved some problems and created others. But never have we made up our minds what we were aiming at or set up any organization to carry out our aims. We have been running an empire by sporadic opportunism while refusing to admit that we have one.

Cuba was the first problem. We had pledged our word not to annex the island. Yet there it was, almost within sight of our shores, and in our possession. After three years of military government, during which we managed to put things in fairly good order, we turned Cuba over to the Cubans and got out. Realizing that they had neither experience in democratic government nor any tradition of such government, we did not burn our bridges behind us when we left. By means of the Platt amendment, which we had inserted in the Cuban Constitution, we reserved the right to go back if it were necessary to preserve independence or an adequate government. The amendment also limited Cuba's action with regard to foreign powers and restricted her borrowing power.

Interventions in Cuba.

We have gone back into Cuba on several occasions. One time we stayed for three years. Intervention of this sort is bound to antagonize somebody and there has been much talk, principally among politicians, in opposition to the Platt amendment as an affront to Cuban sovereignty. Whatever may be the outcome along this line, Cuba is much too near to us ever to free herself entirely from our influence. If the political ties were completely severed the economic ties would be equally effective. Americans have upward of $1,500,000,000 invested in the republic. Two-thirds of its foreign trade is with this country, which is the only adequate market for its two greatest products—sugar and tobacco. Even though we have in Cuba no officials other than diplomatic, the republic is, in the European sense, an American dependency, a part of the "American empire."

There is no question as to the status of the neighboring Island of Porto Rico. It is an American possession, whose inhabitants are American citizens, albeit more of them speak Spanish than English. Porto Rico was conquered during the trouble with Spain, and as there was no pledge regarding its future it has remained American. Nor is there any particular desire on the part of the Porto Ricans to change their status. There has been talk at times of independence, but even those who talked it did so with their tongues in their cheeks. Porto Rico is much too small to stand alone and few would care to exchange any other sovereignty for that of the United States.

The Porto Ricans elect their own Legislature and all but a few of the highest officials, including the Governor. These are appointed by the President. And the principal political contention of the Porto Ricans at present is that they should be allowed to elect their own Governor. They have repeatedly importuned Washington to be permitted to do so, but, so far at least, without avail.

Economic problems would appear to be of greater importance than political ones. There has been an enormous development under the American régime and the production of the island has been greatly increased. Social problems have not been as adequately handled, however. The standard of public health has been materially improved. But a generous birth rate has provided a population growth which has more than kept pace with the increase of economic opportunity. As a result it is a debatable question whether the Porto Ricans are better off economically than they were before the coming of the Americans.

It is in regard to the Philippines that the problems of empire have caused us most concern. They comprise 115,000 square miles of territory scattered over 7,000 islands and inhabited by close to 13,000,000 people. And they are half a world away. Under the Spanish régime Roman Catholic missionaries had Christianized the Filipinos, comprising about nine-tenths of the population. But the Moros, the other tenth, have been Mohammedan for centuries. The religious division has been emphasized by the contempt in which the Moros have always held the Filipinos, whom, in pre-Spanish days, they used to raid and despoil at will.

We have attempted to inculcate our ideas of government and democracy in the Philippines. Schools have been established and the offices of government have been open to the people. All but very few of these offices are now filled by Filipinos. The Governor General, a few of the higher administrative officers and five of the nine Supreme Court justices are Americans. The government on this basis functions satisfactorily.

So successful has been our attempt to instill American ideas that the leading Filipino politicians now demand complete independence and quote our own history to us by the yard to support their contention that they are entitled to it. In 1916 the Jones act stated that it was our purpose to give the islands independence when they had established a stable government, and the Filipinos have construed this as a promise whose fulfillment they demand forthwith.

President Wilson shifted almost the whole responsibility of administration to the Filipinos, with results sufficiently discouraging to make President Harding reverse the policy. The Filipino spokesmen, however, undaunted by the results of their self-governing experiment, boldly argue that the people of the islands prefer self-government, no matter how bad it is, to American government, no matter how good it is.

This is noble devotion to the principle of self-determination. But the evidence is not altogether clear that the Filipino spokesmen—politicians who in the natural course of events would constitute any independent government which might be established in the Philippines—speak for the masses of the Filipino people or for themselves. Thus we have to face a truly imperial issue with uncertainty both as to the desire of the subject people for independence and as to their ability to stand alone.

There is further confusion in the Moro question. These Moslems of Mindanao and the Sulu Archipelago state very plainly that they will not submit to Filipino domination. If they are as good as their word, independence for the Philippines means an invitation to Moro rebellion. In view of the serious financial strain that a Filipino Republic would have to sustain in any case, this makes the problem of independence still more difficult.

And then there are economic interests involved. While we have only about $15,000,000 invested in the islands, their annual trade amounts to more than $300,000,000, of which $210,000,000 is with the United States. This, of course, is a highly important item, but it does not follow that the economic interest in the islands is all in favor of their retention. The three chief exports to this country are sugar, hemp and cocoanut oil. Sugar and cocoanut oil compete directly with our domestic producers and they have suddenly acquired a new and intense interest in Philippine independence.

Philippine Proposals.

So the issues are tangled. A number of proposals for unraveling them are now before the Solons of Washington. Senator King, from a sugar-beet State, would give them independence without further argument. Senator Vandenberg, from a sugar-beet and manufacturing State, would drag out the process of emancipation during ten years. Senator Bingham, from a manufacturing State, would have a round-table meeting in Manila to study the whole question anew. Representative Nelson would set up a permanent Filipino-American commission to advise on all questions of our relations with the islands. Surely, even though we have no empire, we have our imperial problems.

Nor have we by any means confined them to the fruits of the Spanish-American War. Almost immediately after that struggle we took on American Samoa, consisting of some seventy-five square miles in the South Seas inhabited by about 10,000 people. This dependency, like the Island of Guam with its 13,000 people, has never been endowed with any thought-out system of government. Each has a naval officer as Governor and now and then echoes of complaint against their "tyranny" reach Washington. Although their combined trade exceeds $1,250,000 a year, they are too small and too distant to hold for long the attention of any but those officials directly charged with their supervision.

Two additional imperial trifles may be mentioned here. These are Wake Island, a rock in mid-Pacific, and the Midway Islands, where there is a cable relay station. They have neither population nor trade, so that they involve no great responsibilities.

Our next imperial adventure of real importance was the acquisition of the Panama Canal Zone. We had dickered with Colombia and the French canal company over this for years. Every time we negotiated a treaty with the Colombian representatives the Colombian Congress raised the price. President Roosevelt finally lost patience and, when the French interests stirred the Panamanians to revolt, he promptly recognized the Republic of Panama and discouraged the efforts of Colombia to regain control of its lost province. We afterward paid Colombia $25,000,000 as consolation money.

Meanwhile, a treaty made with the new republic in 1904 ceded us the Canal Zone, which was set up as a United States military reservation and placed in charge of the War Department. Its 549 square miles and 30,000 inhabitants are subject to the orders of the army officer detailed as Governor.

The Canal Zone itself thus presents no difficult imperial problem. But the control and protection of the canal involves us in particularly intimate relations with the Republic of Panama. It would be disastrous to have Panama at war while we were at peace or to have Panama at peace while we were at war. Hostile air bases in Panamanian territory would be an intolerable menace to the safety of the canal. These and a dozen other considerations make it necessary for us to interest ourselves in Panamanian affairs to an extent which sometimes draws resentment from the Panamanians. The situation is comparable to that of Britain with regard to Egypt, although Panama's reliance upon us to preserve her independence and our formal recognition of that independence in our dealings with her have made our control less obnoxious than it would otherwise be.

Caribbean Interests.

The construction of the canal heightened our already keen interest in Caribbean affairs. The proximity of the Caribbean countries to our own southern coasts gives them a strategic importance we could not afford to disregard. This is increased by the fact that they now flank one of our main trade routes and one of our most vital naval arteries. Closing the canal would reduce the value of our navy by one-half. Rather than double its size, we have elected to take all precautions against interference with the canal.

This has led us into extending our actual possessions in the Caribbean to the extent of securing three naval bases—one at Guantanamo in Cuba and two, at the Corn Islands and at Fonseca Bay, in Nicaragua. These sites for bases might in an emergency be highly useful for the protection of the Panama Canal or for the protection of a second canal through Nicaragua, if that should ever be constructed. By agreement with the Nicaraguan Government a corps of army engineers is now resurveying the Nicaraguan route and there is considerable support in this country for the project of a second canal. It is urged on the double ground of strategy—a second Atlantic-Pacific waterway in case of accident to the Panama route—and of commerce on the theory that the traffic of the present canal is rapidly outgrowing its facilities.

This second canal project has heightened our interest in Nicaragua. It has been especially keen since we learned that in 1908 the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister instructed his Minister in Paris to inform the Japanese Ambassador there that Nicaragua was favorably disposed to consider any advances Japan might make in regard to canal rights.

Intervention in Nicaragua.

This, however, was only one of the considerations that led us to intervene in Nicaragua. President Zelaya was not only hostile to the United States but was possessed of ambitions which kept all Central America in turmoil. His going was welcome enough to all but his partisans. And in 1916 the canal matter was settled by a treaty in which we purchased the option for any canal that might be built.

American marines preserved peace in Nicaragua until 1925, when they were withdrawn. Almost immediately revolution broke out and they were recalled—in considerable force. The events which followed are well known. Regrettable as they may have been, they had the happy result of restoring the Liberal party to power in a peaceful election and both parties joined in a welcome to President-elect Hoover and—what is perhaps more significant—in erecting a monument to General McCoy for conducting the election.

American officials still exercise sufficient control over the finances of Nicaragua to insure regularity in their handling. Along with this goes inevitably a measure of political guidance. To what extent this influence should be characterized as "empire" is a moot question. But European writers do not hesitate to class Nicaragua as an American "protectorate," while many of our own authorities compromise on the term "quasi-protectorate."

Whatever the proper term for the relation, we are still more deeply involved in Haiti. The Eastern third of the island of Santo Domingo was ruled by a series of dictators from 1804 until 1915. Most of this time it was nominally a republic, but its "elections" were regularly decided by military predominance. There was a complete governmental breakdown in 1915 and American marines were landed to restore order. This done, Washington insisted upon a treaty which would authorize American supervision for a period of ten years. The necessity for refunding outstanding indebtedness caused this treaty to be extended for another ten years, so that we are legally in control until 1936.

The remainder of the island, occupied by the Dominican Republic, has also been the scene of American activity. Foreign intervention was threatened in 1905 and President Roosevelt secured an agreement for American supervision of the national finances. This so increased the government income that it gave a new impetus to revolution. In 1915 we intervened and set up an American military government. For eight years this government of Americans administered the affairs of the island. Then we withdrew, leaving only the Receiver General of Customs as before.

Thus in Haiti and Santo Domingo, as in Cuba and Nicaragua, we have actually assumed political control. In the last three instances we have withdrawn that control as soon as there was promise of stability in governmental affairs. In Haiti we are prepared to withdraw in 1936 unless President Hoover's commission recommends some other arrangement. All of these countries, and Panama too, remain to a certain extent under the influence of the United States. This is inevitable in view of the enormous political and economic predominance of the United States in this region.

Purchase of Virgin Islands.

One more piece must be added to complete the picture-puzzle of the actual "American Empire." That is the Virgin Islands. This group, lying east of Porto Rico, was purchased from Denmark in 1917. The population is about 20,000, all but 5 per cent of whom are negroes. They are citizens of the United States, but the Governor, usually the naval officer commanding the naval station on the islands, is appointed by the President. This naval station was the chief reason for our giving $25,000,000 for the islands. Their commerce with this country amounts to about $3,000,000 a year.

Another piece which should perhaps go into the border of our imperial picture-puzzle is Liberia. American abolition societies founded a colony at Monrovia in 1822. The country was declared an independent republic in 1847. Its Constitution is modeled on that of the United States, except that the vote is limited to landowners. All but about 100,000 of its 2,000,000 people are as yet uncivilized. Since 1912 the control of the customs has been under an American Receiver General, after the manner of the Caribbean republics. Hence Liberia, too, falls under the head of "quasi-protectorates."

Such is the "American Empire." We may make such reservations as we like, but in the European view all of the countries mentioned must be included. In that case our overseas "empire" comprises 911,000 square miles of territory—almost one-third of the area of continental United States. Its population is well over 22,000,000—say one-fifth of the continental population. In both these respects it ranks fifth among the empires of the world. In commercial relations it is even more important.

The total commerce of all our possessions, dependencies and "quasi-protectorates" is well above $1,500,000,000 a year. Of this amount upward of 77 per cent is with the United States. This is greater than in the case of any other country. Japan is next with a percentage of 71. Of course the commerce of the British Empire far exceeds the American figure, and the trade with the mother country is more than three times as great as ours. But the share of the mother country in the trade of the British Empire is only 34 per cent.

We have made much of our opportunities. Nor have we neglected our responsibilities. Both may loom larger in the future.

IN SIXTH AVENUE'S LABOR MART

Job Hunters Crowd the Agencies, but The Jobs Are Now Scarcer

ONE of New York's important employment centres lies between Twenty-fifth and Fiftieth Streets on Sixth Avenue, with the greater number of offices concentrated above Forty-second Street and below Thirty-second Street. Throughout the daylight hours thousands of men and women, the former in a large majority, crowd about the bulletin boards that flank the entrances to the offices. Eagerly they read the meager sprinkling of announcements on the boards. When an employe adds a few new ones, or removes some that have been posted, the group surges forward and watches with interest. It never fails that one or two of their number detach themselves and go in, while a few move on with a shrug of the shoulders.

It is an amazing gathering that packs the sidewalks of Sixth Avenue. The knots of people who stand silently gazing are made up of representatives of New York's cosmopolitan population and many persons who are strangers in the city. The jobless are drifting in from Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston and even more remote parts of the country where work is scarce. On the whole, they are a well-dressed lot, bearing the stamp of days when work was plenty and wages high. It is not a bread line crowd, and the Bowery type in this assemblage of job hunters is rare.

"In years we have seen nothing like it," says the employment agents.

"Not since 1907, has there been so little work and so many applicants," said one of the veterans, who has been in the business for thirty years.

The big Sixth Avenue labor mart is accustomed to a slack season in December and January, but under normal circumstances conditions improve in February. This year the decline has been steady since November, and shows no signs of recovery. Lowered demand for help was marked after the Wall Street crash, which is thought to be the cause of the present unemployment situation by many of the agents. There are a few, however, who are of the opinion that employment began to slip off earlier in the year.

"It is a question of overproduction," they say. "Our books show that factories to which in former times we sent large numbers of men and women began early to lay off workers. Now they are retaining just enough to keep open. Where a few months ago we had an income of $200 a week from our industrial placements, today we have nothing. Business is about 60 per cent lower on Sixth Avenue this month than it was in the same period last year."

When the offices open for business the applicants quickly fill them, pushing their way up to the desk. "Anything today?" they ask. A few are in luck; others look wearily about for a few moments, then drop onto a chair and wait. From time to time a telephone bell rings; an order comes over the wire. "A couple of dishwashers, O. K.," answers the office manager. There may follow a request for a truck driver or a soda dispenser.

The man at the telephone summons such applicants as he thinks can fill the positions. They pay their fees—10 per cent of the first week's wages is required—and with their receipt in their hand proceed on their way. The others sit in silence—listening, hoping.

The Sixth Avenue employment agencies are a barometer of the labor situation in New York. According to information gleaned from them, one of the fields of employment hardest hit is that dealing with the world of amusement—hotels, restaurants and dance halls. Many a restaurant and hotel, so they say, is operating its kitchens on a skeleton staff, making two or three men do the work of six. Where in more prosperous times they supplied six cloak room girls, they are now asked to send one. The dearth of employment is felt all down the line where luxurious living is concerned.

So far conditions seem to be more serious among men than women. There are greater numbers of the former than of the latter out of work. Nevertheless there is hardly an agency that does not tell of one or two girls who have come to New York, perhaps from Pennsylvania or the New England States, in the hope of finding remunerative occupation, only to end up penniless on Sixth Avenue.

AMES HEADS UNIVERSITY HE ENTERED AS STUDENT

The New President of Johns Hopkins Has Been With the School for Forty-Seven Years, as Undergraduate, Instructor, Professor, Dean and Provost

By JOHN S. RENWICK.

FIFTY years ago a 15-year-old boy in far-off Minnesota sat by the fireside turning the pages of a monthly magazine. He read a story by Henry James Jr. and a poem by Elizabeth Stoddard. He skipped idly over an article dealing with coffee culture in Brazil and another that pointed out how to obtain success with small fruits.

Then his attention was arrested by an article on Johns Hopkins University, in 1880 the youngest university in America, of which the writer said: "It possesses no history, claims no distinguished sons, has indeed hardly reached the dignity of alma mater."

But the description of the infant university which had taken for its ideals "original research" and "raising the level of educational standards," fascinated the youthful reader. Three years later this same boy dismounted from the train in Baltimore, walked to the two converted dwellings on Howard Street which then sheltered the university, and enrolled as a candidate for a degree. The formal announcement of his appointment as president of Johns Hopkins University will be made at the commemoration day exercises of the university this week.

The New President Is 65.

Today Johns Hopkins University is no longer a university without history, and its distinguished sons are legion. Its new president, Joseph Sweetman Ames, the youth attracted from Minnesota by a magazine article, is 65. He has been associated with the university for forty-seven years, and is the first president who received his undergraduate training at the institution.

At a time when the tendency of boards of trustees to select young men to direct the education policies of institutions, and more often than not to go out of the immediate college family in search of some up-and-coming youngster of unusual administrative ability, those unacquainted with Dr. Ames may feel that his elevation to the presidency of the Hopkins was more of a reward for long and faithful service than the choice of a man ideally suited for leadership.

Yet such is not the case. Fifteen years ago, when President Frank J. Goodnow was selected to succeed Ira Remsen, one of the greatest chemists America has produced, as president of the university, Dr. Ames was strongly considered for the post. When Dr. Goodnow resigned he was the logical successor. Those close to him say that the energy and enthusiasm which recommended him as a leader then are unabated and, if anything, more finely tempered by the intervening years.

He Has Held Various Posts.

After receiving his A. B. degree in 1886 Dr. Ames, in turn, became instructor, professor, dean of the faculty and provost. He succeeded Henry A. Rowland, the most distinguished physicist of his day, as head of the department of physics, and is recognized as one of the world's leading authorities on spectroscopy and aeronautics.

Dr. Ames's sympathy, personality and analytical mind made him, as dean of the faculty, an important factor in the development of university work. It is said that probably the strongest reason for his elevation to the position of provost and now of president was because of his understanding of the ultimate interests of the university.

In appearance and manner Dr. Ames resembles the practical business man rather than a man whose life has been spent in an academic background. An air of competence and decision is manifest in his voice and physical appearance. He is plainly one whose thinking processes move rapidly, and who acts with no trace of hesitation. In conversation he gets directly to the heart of a problem.

His old practice of easy contact with students is still observed. In spite of the many exactions of administrative affairs, Dr. Ames still finds time to see personally all who care to come to him with their problems. Accordingly, a continual procession passes in and out of his office. He himself has described the function of a university president as the interpreter of its ideals. But with him it is more than that—it is keeping in close contact with the faculty and the student body.

As He Views the University.

Dr. Ames sees the purpose of the university as the developing of new knowledge more than as the mere training by rote. Pure scholarship with knowledge for the sake of knowledge as its only reward is something like a religion with him. Yet, he believes that the university's function is also to meet the practical needs of the times.

"It is my opinion that the problem the coming generation must solve has to do with man in his relation to man, and that this is rightly the task of the university," Dr. Ames said. "I say 'my opinion' because I speak as an individual and not as the spokesman of a university. This does not mean that the natural sciences have been advanced to a point where there is no longer room for progress. Quite the contrary, for science is still in its infancy, and the next fifty years will undoubtedly produce wonders undreamed of today.

"But I do mean that the time has come when the university must do for the social sciences what it has done in the past for the other sciences. Our progress has been one-sided. While we have been making over man's environment we have learned little of man himself. As one writer puts it, man is the same old savage in a new civilization.

The New President of Johns Hopkins.

"The Johns Hopkins University has recognized this need by the establishing of the Institute of Law and the Walter Hines Page School of International Relations. The first is not concerned with the training of lawyers, but is devoted solely to the study of the effects of law, in the belief that such basic knowledge is essential before improvement can be attempted. The Page School will be devoted to the study of causes which lead to international differences, and is, accordingly, the projection of the idea back of the Institute of Law into the field of world politics.

The New Task of Today.

"When I came to the Johns Hopkins University nearly half a century ago I was fascinated by the things for which it stood. It seemed to be that the spirit of inquiry, the emphasis on pure scholarship and original research, left nothing to be desired. Also as a young man it seemed to me that natural sciences contained the answer to all things; that it would remove want and all the problems which grow out of it. Now I am older and, I hope, wiser, and I don't think natural science alone is enough.

"The new task, as I see it today, is to study man to learn why he cannot live peacefully with his fellow men, why prosperity is accompanied by rising crime rates, and why this or that reform fails no matter how socially expedient it may seem. We must first understand and control the conditions which play on society before progress can continue without danger of interruption."

In May, 1917, Dr. Ames served as chairman of a committee of the National Research Council which visited France and England to study the development of scientific activities in connection with warfare. It was this experience, he explains, which brought home to him more forcibly than anything else the paradox which results when the discoveries of scientists who labor for the common good of man are diverted for use in war.

Four years ago the trustees under the leadership of President Goodnow decided to emphasize again and in a new way the ideals of the founders, when they planned a university devoted primarily to advanced study. This is spoken of as the Goodnow plan, and it proposes to discontinue, as soon as practical, courses ordinarily given in the first two years of American colleges; to grant no more baccalaureate degrees; to admit to the university only those equipped to do research; to give more intensive training to a comparative few, and finally, to confer only the degree of Doctor of Philosophy and that of Master of Arts, for which four years and three years of residence respectively will be required.

On President Ames's shoulders will fall the burden of carrying out this plan. In speaking of it, he touched on what he regards as the overemphasis which has been placed on the degree as a symbol of accomplishment, as opposed to scholarship for scholarship's sake.

MODELS IN STORE WINDOWS CHANGE WITH DRESS STYLES

Normal Figures Are Reappearing as the Costumes Resume Former Curves

WHEN the window curtains of the big stores are closely drawn in the evening the scene is being shifted, as every one knows. The display department is busy rearranging the offerings, so that next day the latest fashion will be shown in some alluring setting. The experts have been having a harder time than usual in the last few months, however, trying to do justice to the new dresses because the big dolls that have been in use for the past few years are not built to display the frocks of 1930. Humans are not the only ones who have to take stock of waist lines and develop elegance, although they have an advantage over the window figures, which are made of unmalleable materials.

As a result of the caprice of fashion, the workshops of a number of sculptors are humming again; real figures are being modeled this time, with the lines and proportions of a star show girl. They are surprising in their likeness to the ideal girl, especially when compared to the old forms, which were obviously just clothes racks with fantastic faces and bodies. Those creations, seen so much in recent years, have been characterized by their lack of resemblance to natural figures.

The aim of window-dressing, of course, is to make the passing crowd stop and look; not necessarily to make them admire, nor agree, but to put something there that will cause them to notice the articles the store offers for sale. The limitation is, however, that the article must be presented in a desirable light. One may be fantastic or foreign, but never undignified. Hence the hurry to put waist lines and normal curves on the figures that have to fill out the new dresses.

One style trend of today seen on the new models is to mold the hair on the original statue so that it is part of the cast. Afterward it is painted. It was five years after bobbed hair came into vogue before the bobbed-hair dress figure became widespread.

U. S. "BENCHERS" OF COURT "INNS"

THE Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has allotted $7,000 for the purchase of American law books and reports for use in the library of the Middle Temple, London, where many barristers have their law offices. General Dawes, the United States Ambassador, was recently elected an "honorary bencher" of the Middle Temple Inn.

Benchers are the controlling powers of the various "Inns of Court" which examine and admit candidates for the bar. Joseph H. Choate, who was a bencher, once described the Middle Temple as the "great American Inn," five of the signatories of the American Declaration of Independence having been members and having received their law training within its doors.

STUBBORN MAYOR BARS FRANCE FROM REPAIRING OLD CHURCH

THE famous tenth century church of Les Saintes Maries de la Mer, "half house of God and half fortress," situated in a town of the same name near the mouth of the Rhone in Southern France, was recently reported to be sadly in need of repair. The Minister of Fine Arts sent an engineer to investigate. His report showed that the repairs would cost only $960, and a requisition was made on the Mayor of Les Saintes Maries de la Mer for $320, or the third of the total required by law.

The Mayor, being a Communist, declined to contribute the amount, and his action so far has kept the Ministry from proceeding with the necessary work.

The church, an imposing pile of gray stone sheltered from the storms of the Mediterranean by the palisade of Camargu, which skirts the sea, derives its name from the legend that Mary of Bethany, Mary the mother of James and Mary Magdalene, together with Lazarus, Martha and their servant Sarah, landed on the site from a boat as they fled from Palestine under guidance of St. Maximinus.

The edifice was destroyed by Saracen pirates in the early part of the twelfth century, rebuilt in 1144, and again restored by King René in 1449. In the courtyard in the centre there is a fountain which is said to have first gushed forth when the three Marys landed. Its festival days are May 24 and 25. Many gypsies make pilgrimages there to venerate Sarah, who is supposed to have been of their race.

BEST STREET SIGNS.

A STUDY of cast-iron street designation signs has been made by the District of Columbia, involving material, color combinations, elevation and direction. As a result of the night tests for visibility, gold-embossed characters on a black field were decided to be the best. The system now in use consists of gold-leaf characters on a black enamel background.

NEW SOURCES OF SATISFACTION

In addition to the smarter style and greater beauty which result from refinements in Oldsmobile body lines, the interiors reveal new elements of richness and new factors of luxury.

Chief among these are added roominess for rear seat passengers, finer long-wearing upholsteries, and deeper, more comfortable seat cushions.

In addition, there is a new recessed, indirectly-lighted instrument panel. Steering is even more responsive than heretofore. And the windshield is tilted at an angle to eliminate headlight glare and annoying light reflections.

These improvements add much to Oldsmobile beauty, comfort, and luxury. Yet they do not radically change its characteristic appearance. Important engineering advancements are also present in the famous Oldsmobile chassis. They include improved, fully-enclosed four-wheel brakes and improved carburetion. These refinements definitely add to Oldsmobile's value without changing those time-tested fundamentals of design which have proved their dependability through the trials of months and miles.

Today's Oldsmobile is better than ever—smarter than ever. Accept our invitation to see this car and to drive it, in order that you may judge it by your own standards of automobile value.

A NEW COLLEGE THEATRE WILL OPEN THIS WEEK

The Playhouse at Princeton Is One of a Number That Have Grown Up on Campuses Since Universities Began Seriously to Foster Dramatic Art

By R. L. BROCK.

BY the typical hard-headed business man of immediate post Civil War vintage it used to be maintained not without heat that our colleges and universities operated chiefly toward unfitting young men for business that really was business. Obviously, this view is not shared by a generation of equally hard-headed business men which has seen the Business School of Harvard University magnificently endowed by one of the most hard headed of the lot—the veteran banker, George F. Baker.

This being so, no conspicuously widespread development in our American colleges and universities today is lightly to be waved aside as an academic vagary or rudely dismissed as tangential to real life. Now, just at the moment when the hard-headed business men of the theatre as we know it along Broadway profess to be ready to lament the drama and bury it, it happens that great numbers of colleges and universities all over the country—including some of the very biggest—are concentrating seriously on the task of training young men and women for the business of the theatre, at least all that part of the business of the theatre which is the creating art of the theatre.

According to Kenneth MacGowan, who recently traveled some 14,000 miles in the course of a survey for the Carnegie Corporation, 150 colleges now provide courses in practical play-production—not mere lectures on dramatic literature, but laboratory work which involves writing, staging, scene designing, lighting and all the elements which enter into a real performance of a play before an audience.

Activity in High Schools.

Not only that, the activity has spread downward to the high schools, so that of the total of 22,000 high schools in the country, 7,000, or roughly a third of the lot, "are studying and applying production methods to a rather decent grade of play." Each of the 7,000 has a definite course, with an average of fifty students apiece. One of the functions of the college dramatic course becomes automatically the training of instructors in practical amateur dramatics for the high schools. In other words, the usual educational back-alley is created for persons academically trained in any art—the musicians and the graphic artists who become teachers, for example.

Nevertheless, the nation-wide reach of interest in what the Broadway Jeremiahs would have us believe is a moribund form of artistic expression is abundantly demonstrated. And that interest is among the young—where it counts. If many thousand young people are learning to be indifferent players or playwrights, many more thousands are being trained as audiences for the "moribund" spoken drama.

It is mere history that the Church kept alive the stage during the Middle Ages. It is also history that Oxford and Cambridge nursed the drama in the generation which foreran Shakespeare. It is further alleged that history repeats itself. In any case, the phenomenon of the capture of our own colleges by the theatre is arresting. So is the fact that what has happened has mostly happened since the World War, or within the last decade.

Eighteenth Century Experiments.

College dramatics, of course, are not precisely a new thing even in the United States. Students of William and Mary assisted by belles of the infant city of Williamsburg presented plays almost at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Even at Harvard, in the shadow of the Puritans, there is record of the acting in 1760 of "Tancred and Segismunde" by undergraduates who were "like to be prosecuted" for the offense.

Though a long period intervened in which intensive cultivation of political oratory displaced the drama in our institutions of learning—because the ideal of youthful ambition was politics, not art—there have been student organizations dedicated to the stage in many colleges for a generation or more back, organizations, like the Hasty Pudding at Harvard, the Mask and Wig at Pennsylvania and the Triangle at Princeton, the last founded in 1892 by no less a person than Booth Tarkington.

In all such organizations play was the thing, rather than The Play. Taken all together, they made little or no contribution to the grown-up stage of the country. The serious business started, as most people know, with George Pierce Baker at Harvard—Baker with a course called English 47 dating back to 1905 and his workshop beginning in 1912 in the assembly hall of Radcliffe College; Baker, with his crop of bright young playwrights, including Eugene O'Neill, Sidney Howard and Philip Barry, all of whom advertised the new academic line by making big noises on Broadway.

Here was proof positive that a college education in the theatre could lead to success in the business of the theatre. That 150 of our colleges now have practical courses in the arts of the theatre is directly due to this advertisement.

Harvard shied at fostering "officially" the first professional school of the stage and put up a big business school instead. Baker went to Yale with a handsome endowment from E. S. Harkness and set up his school of the stage in the university of Timothy Dwight, who said and believed that theatregoing utterly damned the immortal soul.

For three years now a handsome theatre in the Gothic style has offered to Yale students facilities surpassed at no college in the country, though Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh actually established the first practical department of the drama and had a handsome theatre open in 1914, and though the University of Iowa boasts no less than three theatres.

Cornell also has a fine new theatre in Willard Straight Hall—which likewise is Gothic. The University of North Carolina, from which the Carolina Playmakers come forth and spread the fame of the Tarheel dialect and the rustic ways of those parts, has a theatre. Its theatre is made over from something else and has a classic portico, so it cannot be Gothic. Harvard still has no theatre, Gothic or otherwise.

But Princeton has. It is the new theatre at Princeton, to be opened this week, which clinches the argument that the American university has taken the American stage under its protection. Princeton has no department of the drama. But Princeton has the Triangle Club. The handsome new theatre—it is Gothic, of course, like everything new at Princeton, even though Ralph Adams Cram has ceased to be architect-in-ordinary—is the Triangle Club's theatre.

Princeton's New Theatre.

Half of the $500,000 cost was raised by the club, the other half was contributed by Thomas McCarter. It is called the McCarter Theatre in honor of the benefactor's father. After a quaint fashion of academic finance the donors made a gift of the building to the university and the university gives the use of the theatre to the Triangle Club.

By the way, the name Triangle is explained as of eclectic origin. In the first place, Princeton has a way of naming clubs for familiar features of the campus—for example, Arch and Cannon. There used to be a campus walk called the Triangle. In the second place, three older organizations were joined to make the Triangle—the Dramatic Association, the University Orchestra and the University Glee Club. In the third place, according to Tarkington, the "triangle is in the nature of a musical instrument." As the combined reasons themselves compose a trinity or triangle, the name may be counted happily chosen.

According to some, the site of the theatre has been less happily chosen. It stands close to the railway station and sticks up much higher than most Princeton buildings. There is, however, this advantage in the Gothic style for the theatre: The height required by the scene loft uplifts an architectural mass which naturally assumes the form of a big square or quadrangular tower. Put the tank in a turret on top of this tower—where it really belongs—and you have the elements of a very decent Gothic design.

This is what has been done and very well done by D. K. Este Fisher Jr., the architect, with the new Princeton Theatre. It was also what was done in Baker's theatre at Yale. The Princeton design is bigger, taller, simpler and more massive. It is thus more impressive than the Yale building. Perhaps, however, the comparison is not quite fair.

As the Princeton theatre is merely a theatre, not a congeries of buildings to house the activities of a university dramatic department and laboratory, it stands out a bit abruptly in the midst of an open space. This open space will ultimately, no doubt, be occupied by auxiliary buildings—workshops of various sorts for the carrying out of the practical tasks connected with the production of plays.

Though Princeton has no department of the drama, dramatics are shepherded there and kept in due relation with matters curricular by Professor Donald Clive Stuart, operating officially as something in modern languages. Stuart has been closely associated for years with the Triangle Club's productions and the Triangle Club's tours, which extend as far south as New Orleans and Jacksonville and as far west as St. Paul. He has also been closely associated with the work of Princeton's own Little Theatre, called Théâtre Intime, a group of undergraduates who for seven years past have been producing plays in the transformed Murray Dodge Chapel, seating only about 250 people.

The annual offering of the Triangle, as most people know, is a musical show. The first show, done by Booth Tarkington and Post Wheeler, was called "The Honorable Julius Caesar." This year's show, which has already been on its tour, but which will be revived on Feb. 20 for the opening of the new theatre, is called "The Golden Dog." After that—early in May—"Monsieur Beaucaire" will be presented as a special compliment to the founder of the Triangle.

The McCarter Theatre, being designed primarily for Triangle shows, is a big theatre. It seats 1,080, has a stage 42 feet deep and 90 feet high, and the most complete possible equipment for lighting. The lobbies are spacious, with quaint decorations in the leaded windows suggesting the history of the drama; the stairways are wide and the seats arranged for comfort rather than compactness. In one respect this theatre aims at doing something quite out of the scope of Baker's considerably smaller theatre. It is the plan to have professional companies—even successful plays from Broadway with the original casts—presented from time to time upon this academic stage. No list of such attractions has yet been announced, but, after all, Princeton is less than two hours from Broadway.

Activities at Harvard.

While Harvard has no theatre, Harvard is not quite out of the movement by which the colleges are saving the theatre for America. Though there is not yet an official Harvard University School of the Drama, there has just been founded—and welcomed by President Lowell to the university precincts, even to the Yard itself—the Cambridge School of Drama, which is a sort of volunteer extracurricular contribution of Harvard men interested in the stage.

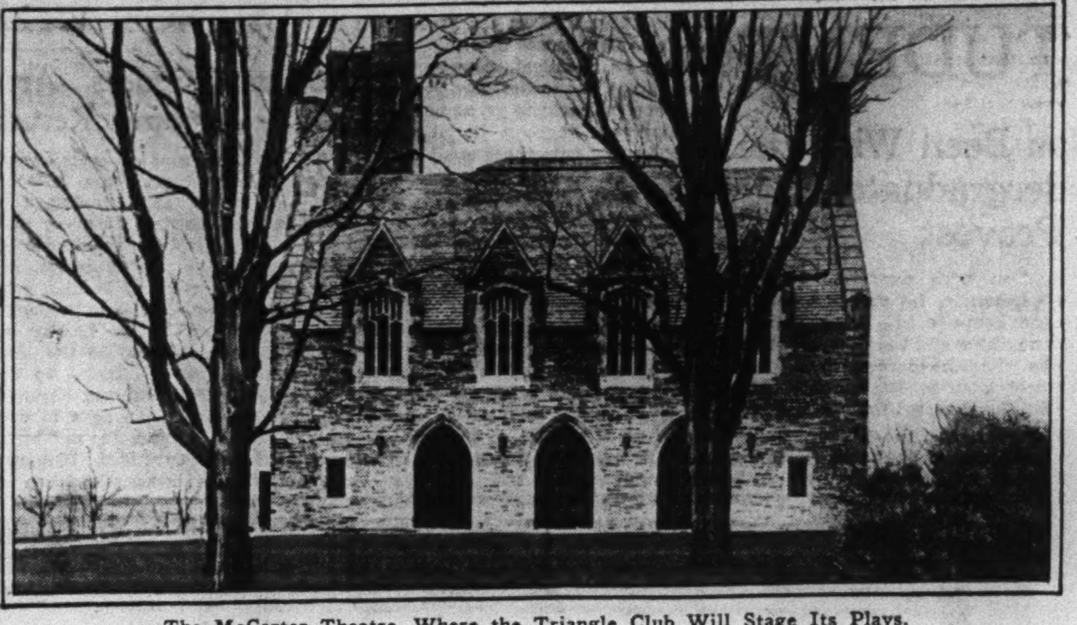
This Cambridge School of the Drama proposes to draw its attendance from Harvard and Radcliffe (Princeton has to borrow town girls for women's parts in the Théâtre Intime shows) and to allow also some outsiders—as men from Massachusetts Tech. It is already launched as this is read, with Albert R. Lovejoy (fetched all the way from the Pacific Coast) as director and Walter Prichard Eaton and H. W. L. Dana as lecturers, respectively, on the drama of America and that of Europe.

Almost everybody that is anybody on the stage and who ever went to Harvard is on the board of governors of the school and is liable, it seems, to be called on for special lectures. Winthrop Ames is on the list, Owen Wister, Owen Davis, Robert Edmond Jones, Walter Hampden, Eugene O'Neill, H. T. Parker, the veteran critic, Percy Mackaye, and Lee Simonson and Maurice Wertheim of the Theatre Guild.

It is the last named who has underwritten the enterprise for the next three years, by which time the Harvard authorities may have decided whether they can afford to take up officially the training of persons who intend to devote themselves to the various branches of the composite art of entertainment.

In any case, so many of our universities have already raised the theatre to a rank equal with that of the law, medicine, engineering, &c., that the entire higher educational system may be said to be committed to the maintenance of an art which the one-time commercial exploiters of that art are ready to abandon to the movies and surrender to the talkies.

A NEW HOME OF THE DRAMA AT PRINCETON



The McCarter Theatre, Where the Triangle Club Will Stage Its Plays.

NEW EVIDENCE THAT GREEKS ADDED TO STATUARY GROUPS

NEW evidence that it was the practice of the ancient Greeks to add to groups of statuary—sometimes to the confusion of modern students of their art—is said to have been brought to light by a recent archaeological expedition off Cape Artemisium. There, more than a year ago, a bronze statue of Zeus, described as magnificent, was dragged up in a fisherman's net. Immediately following the first discovery, the bronze figures of a horse and boy were brought up out of the waters off the cape, and the latest searchings have resulted in the recovery of missing portions.

Archaeologists from Athens who have conducted the investigations are of the opinion that a ship carrying the art treasures—probably to Constantinople—went down in a storm. A leaden anchor, many iron and bronze nails, pieces of wood and a large number of utensils were found on the sea bottom near by and several seals for documents, which indicated that the wreck had taken place in the first century, B. C.

While the statue of Zeus has from the first been regarded as an important archaeological find, it is the figures of the horse and the boy that have provided the more interesting study. At first it was supposed that they formed part of a charioteer group, similar to the famous Charioteer at Delphi, the boy performing the usual office of guide. The figure of the boy was declared to be of Hellenistic workmanship of the third century B. C., and, with only the head and one foreleg to go by, it was assumed that the horse was of the same period. It was further imagined that the horse was pictured at full gallop, with the boy running beside the chariot.

But now, according to a correspondent of The Manchester Guardian, it is certain that there was no chariot or even a second horse, and that the figures of the horse and boy formed a single piece of statuary. For the right leg of the boy has been recovered, so that the figure is complete, while the second foreleg and one hindleg of the horse have been found. The angle at which the hoof of this hindleg is molded indicates that the horse was not galloping, but standing reared erect, its forefeet clawing the air, its head held almost vertical. After the figure of the boy had been thoroughly cleaned it was discovered that on the inside of the thighbone was a joint by which it had been attached to the horse's back. The actual position in which the boy must have been seated is said to confirm the theory regarding the erect attitude of the horse. Further, it is held that the horse belongs not to the century to which the figure of the boy is attributed, but to the fifth.

The discovery, according to the correspondent, confirms a theory which has often been voiced but so far never proved, and may lead to a re-examination of many of the world's most famous antiquities.

VICKSBURG'S RIVER BRIDGE NOW NEARING COMPLETION

At Points Further and Further South the Mississippi Has Been Spanned

ANOTHER bridge across the Mississippi River—this one at Vicksburg—approaches completion. Since James B. Eads spanned the stream at St. Louis more than half a century ago bridges have been built at points successively further south. Fourteen years ago the most southerly one was completed at Memphis. The one at Vicksburg is within 500 miles of the great river's mouth. Others are projected at New Orleans.

The Vicksburg bridge, including approaches, will measure some 8,500 feet in length. Its main span will be more than 800 feet. The concrete work had been virtually finished before the first of the year, the steel work was nearly done on the approaches and the simple truss spans, and the east cantilever approach span was in an advanced stage of construction.

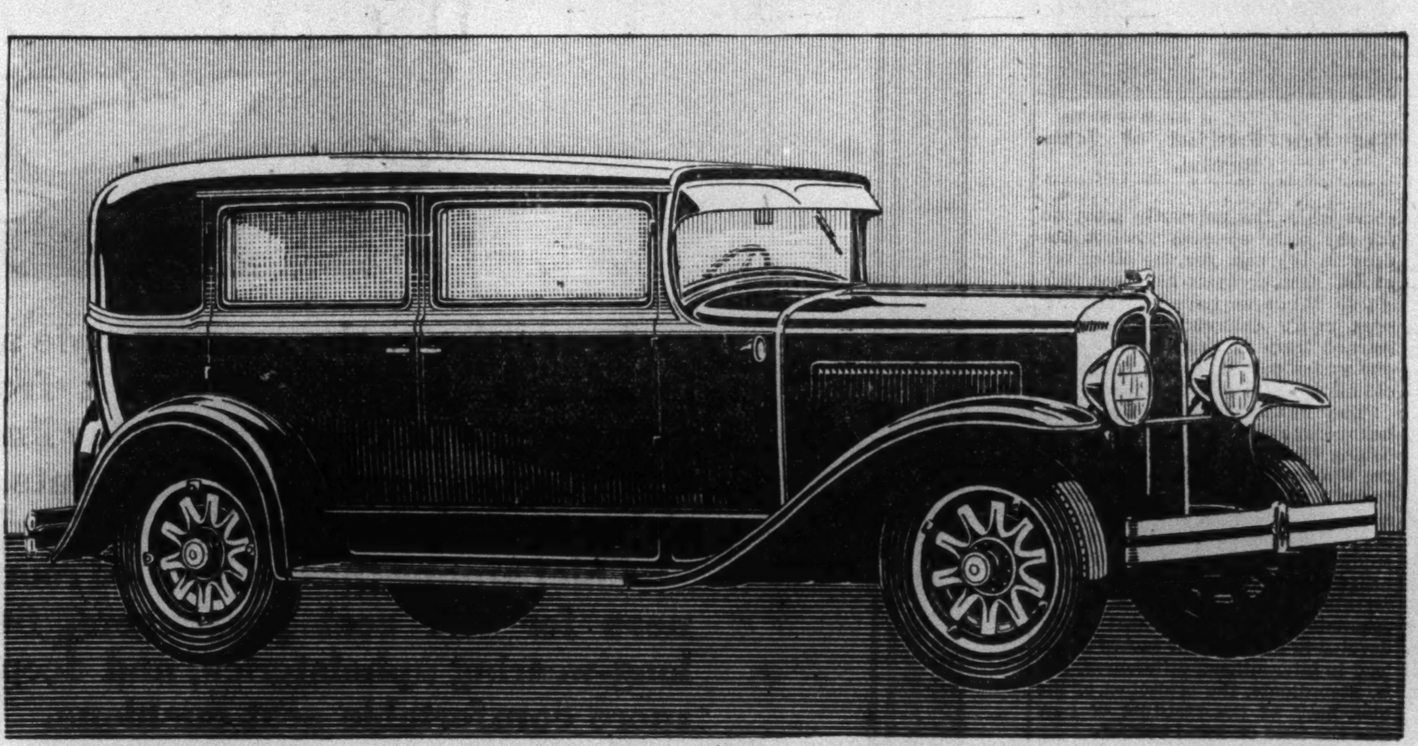
It is now possible to zig-zag back and forth scores of times across the Mississippi. Its bridges, as listed by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, number 126. The vast majority, of course, are on the upper river. At Minneapolis alone there are 27, and at St. Paul 7. But the last decade has seen increasing bridge building activities on the lower river. Two highway bridges, in addition to that at Vicksburg, which will carry rail traffic as well as vehicular, are now under construction south of St. Louis. St. Louis, in the years since the Eads bridge was finished, has added three others, also carrying rail and motor traffic.

Half a dozen spans across the Mississippi antedate the Eads bridge. In 1868 a swinging bridge was constructed at Quincy, Ill., and another at Burlington. Two years later Keokuk matched Quincy's. The one at Hannibal, Mo., dates from 1871, and that at Louisiana, also in Missouri, from 1873. The Eads bridge was finished in 1874. It alone served St. Louis for sixteen years.

Soon after St. Louis got its second bridge there was another considerably further south. In 1893 the river was crossed at Memphis by a railway bridge, the main span of which measured 790 feet.

A FAMOUS NAME
A FINER CAR

with newly styled bodies by Fisher



The 4-Door Sedan Body by Fisher

IN ITS modish new bodies by Fisher, as in its smoother 60-horsepower engine and rugged chassis, the New Series Pontiac Big Six has been notably improved. It is a smarter, more vividly beautiful car, with its fresh new Duco colorings and deep, luxurious upholstery in harmonizing shades. It is also longer, lower and more rakish in appearance, due to the fine sweep of its new streamline belt moulding.

Departing in no important essential from Pontiac styling of before, the New Series Pontiac Big Six represents a sound example of keeping an attractive car always abreast of the current mode.

HOW CITY GUNMEN GET THEIR PISTOLS

Applications to Own a Gun Under Sullivan Act Are Carefully Scrutinized, but Weapons Are Often Bought Outside This State

AMONG disarmament proposals the eternal effort to separate the gunman from his gun is still New York's outstanding piece of unfinished business. When the Sullivan law was passed twenty years ago the State congratulated itself upon having one of the most stringent regulations over the ownership of pistols in the country. But in spite of that permit law, the gunman has continued to get a gun and to use it. And conditions have now become such that last week the Baumes Crime Commission saw the need of introducing in the Legislature a bill which would abolish the Sullivan act and limit the carrying of pistols to officers of the law.

Who has a right to own and carry a gun in New York now? How many permits are issued by the Police Department each year and upon what grounds are they granted or refused? Where does the gunman get his gun if the Sullivan act is enforced?

The Sullivan act in its most famous provision states that:

"Any person over the age of 16 years, who shall have in his possession in any city, village or town of this State, any pistol, revolver or other firearm of a size which may be concealed upon the person, without a written license therefor, issued to him as hereinafter prescribed, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and if he has been previously convicted of a crime he shall be guilty of a felony."

Issuing of Licenses.

The act provides that the "written license" shall be issued by the Police Commissioner in the city of New York. Judges or justices of courts of record outside New York may issue them. Here in the city the issuing of these permits to own and carry pistols is centred in the Second Precinct, better known as the Greenwich Street police station, where all applications are received and passed upon.

Bank messengers and others who habitually carry large sums of money, the drivers of the familiar armored cars that give the "cheka" touch to our streets, householders who want to arm themselves against burglars, and every one else who has a good—or bad—reason for wanting to own a gun must make written application for a permit.

Considering the number of persons among New York's millions who might want to own pistols, the number of permits issued is surprisingly small. Considering the number of gunmen who obviously do own pistols, the number of permits issued is seen to bear small relation to the number in use.

One person in every 200 in New York City has a permit to own a pistol. The police issue between 30,000 and 35,000 permits each year. So far in 1930 approximately 21,000 permits have been issued. The greatest number of these went to men who worked in the financial district where pistols are most needed. They are renewed from year to year. About one permit in every five goes to a householder.

Permits are obtained in the following manner: The person who wants to own or carry a gun goes to the nearest police station and asks for an application blank. He fills it out, stating his reason for making the application, whether he has ever been arrested, and whether he has had a previous permit. Three character vouchers are required. And the applicant is also finger-printed.

The applications are then sent down to the Greenwich Street Station and passed on. Applicants who can show no valid reason for needing a pistol are refused. Applicants who have criminal records, or who cannot get three people to vouch for them, or who show by their appearance and actions that it would scarcely be safe to trust them with pistols, are refused. Last year more than 600 applications were turned down.

The persons who show valid reasons for needing a pistol and who seem to be capable of handling one are given identification cards. These are the permits, and they are issued either for owning and carrying pistols about or for ownership restricted to the premises for which they are intended—such as a home or a store. The card has two parts. One half of it is the identification. A stub to be detached at one end is to be filled out and given to the salesman if a pistol is to be bought.

For it is extremely difficult for the ordinary person to buy a pistol in New York. The law requires that this permit stub be registered by the organization selling the gun and returned to the Police Department. Pistol dealers are required to report to the State authorities whenever they order guns for sale, and they must all be accounted for. When a person who has obtained a license to carry a pistol in connection with his work—as in a bank or a jewelry store—leaves that employment, his permit is canceled. And when a person who has a pistol permit is arrested, one of the first steps in the legal procedure that follows is the cancellation of his permit.

Nevertheless, gunmen continue to get guns. How do they do it? One answer to that is the fact that other parts of the country, and other States not too far from New York, have less stringent laws regarding the ownership of pistols. It is not difficult for these men to obtain their artillery outside the city and transport it here, police officials assert. Then its next appearance may be at a coroner's inquest. And it is pointed out that a single pistol once in lawful hands may pass on into a long and circuitous career of crime.

Pistols for Rent.

One of the most ingenious methods by which crooks might get pistols came to the attention of the police not long ago when it was said that certain entrepreneurs of the underworld had regular agencies where pistols might be rented on a day to day basis. Three young men told the police that for $20 a day they not only rented pistols but got lists of places that were likely settings for stick-ups. The police are checking up on that racket.

More serious are the charges made from time to time against judges outside New York City that they abuse their power of issuing pistol permits. A few years ago the practice attracted widespread attention, and so much publicity was turned toward the judges or justices who had issued pistol permits that the number dropped considerably. It was advocated at the time that the Sullivan law should be changed so that permits could only be issued to persons in the counties where they lived.

"Under the existing law," said Commissioner Whalen in discussing this question, "the duty of issuing pistol licenses is conferred upon a judge or justice of a court of record in this State, except in the city of New York, where the duty is conferred upon the Police Commissioner. Section 1,897, Subdivision 11, of the penal law provides that any pistol license issued pursuant to that section and not otherwise limited as to place or time of possession shall be effective throughout New York. As a result, any pistol license issued in any part of this State is effective in the city of New York.

"In the past several flagrant instances have been brought to the public attention where men with criminal records have been in possession of a pistol license issued outside of the city of New York which permitted them to carry weapons within this city. It is, therefore, recommended that Section 1,897, Subdivision 11, of the penal law be amended so as to provide that any pistol license issued outside of the city of New York shall have no validity within the city except where such a license was approved by the Police Commissioner.

"This amendment would prevent any person from lawfully possessing a pistol in the city of New York where he could not have obtained a license if his application were made to the Police Commissioner of the city of New York."

PEPYS MAZER AN EXAMPLE OF OLD WOODEN WINE BOWLS

Used Before Glasses, Only a Few Are Known And They Bring High Prices

THE famous bowl known as the Pepys mazer, for four centuries the property of the Edward VI almshouses at Saffron Walden, Essex, has been sold to an unnamed American for a sum "considerably more" than $22,500.

So ancient is the mazer that Whitaker says wine in England was first drunk out of the mazer bowl, afterward out of the bugle-horn. Though the earliest known examples date no further back than the fourteenth century, numerous references have been found in inventories and wills as far back as the twelfth century.

The Pepy mazer is a small bowl of maplewood standing 2 3-16 inches in height and 7⅝ inches across. Around the lip is a plain band of silver-gilt, a little deeper outside the bowl than inside. It bears the London hall-marks of 1507-8 and the head of the maker's mark, which is the head of a saint. Inside the bowl is a circular medallion, a plate of silver-gilt, and an engraving of the Virgin and the Child in a glory of long rays.

This print, which in other mazers is usually riveted carefully with nails, is in this case secured to the bowl by an iron nail driven through the middle. Possibly this clumsy fastening, as well as the existence of a large patch of cement under the bowl, would indicate that this mazer originally possessed a foot, now lost.

Recorded in 1524.

Little is known with certainty about this bowl except that it was at the almshouses at Saffron Walden in 1524, as an inventory of that period records: "In the Botre (buttery) a masyr wt sylver and gylt." Of late years the bowl has been used on several occasions, especially by the Governors who drank out of it at the annual election. Each person who drank out of it gave a shilling to the town crier who handed it round. It was so used until quite recently, but being found leaky the practice was discontinued. Then it was used as a ballot dish, and for dispensing certain money doles to the inmates of the almshouses.

An Ancient British Relic Now in America.

There can be no doubt that this is the mazer from which Pepys drank on a visit to Saffron Walden and Audley End on Feb. 27, 1659. He says in his diary:

"In our going, my landlord carried us through a very old hospital or almshouse, where forty poor people was maintained; a very old foundation. * * * They brought me a draft of their drink in a brown bowl, tipt with silver, which I drank off, and at the bottom was a picture of the Virgin and the Child in her arms, done in silver."

Notwithstanding the large number of mazers which must have been made in England a very small number are extant. No more than sixty are known at the present time, though it is possible that a diligent search might bring several more to light. Those known to us today have survived because of their workmanship, unique even in their own time. The mazer was in common use and it is certain that these more domestic ones had no decorations.

EARLY COAST INDIAN RELICS FOUND IN OLD SHELL HEAPS

Tenth Century Weapons and Utensils Disclosed Along Maine and Nova Scotia Shores

FURTHER studies of the relics of Indians who inhabited the coastal region of Eastern Maine and Nova Scotia at a period estimated roughly at about 1,000 years ago have been recently compiled by Canadian authorities. The principal trace of the most definitely known of these Indians, the Micmacs, is in shell-heaps, created apparently by the deposit through generations beside a camp or village site from the mussels and clams which were a main source of supply for foods, weapons and utensils.

The shell-heaps are found in many localities along the coast east of Portland, Me., up to ten feet in depth and several hundred square feet in extent. They are now often exposed at the surface where soil that had gathered above them has been washed away by the sea, and they are occasionally discovered during excavations for road construction or dwellings. Archaeologists have found many of the larger heaps stratified, indicating deposits over several centuries, from a site which was probably inhabited, then abandoned for a time and inhabited again. Pieces of weapons, tools and pottery, occasional scraps of bones of animals and other relics are disclosed from which an outline of the lives of the peoples who left them and a view of their culture can be reconstructed.

Extensive investigations of the shell-heaps in Maine have been carried out by Warren K. Moorehead of Andover, Mass., as field director for the New England Archaeological Survey, in connection with Phillips Andover Academy and Harvard University, and some of his findings have been published in a volume of "Maine Archaeology."

The recent Canadian studies are printed in a bulletin entitled "Some Shell-Heaps of Nova Scotia," issued by the National Museum of Canada, through the Dominion Department of Mines. This contains two reports, on "The Archaeology of Merigonish Harbor, Nova Scotia," by Harlan I. Smith, and on "The Eisenhauer Shell-Heap, Mahone Bay, Nova Scotia," by W. J. Wintemberg, as well as drawings of tools and other artifacts found in the heaps.

This Eisenhauer heap was small and unstratified, probably the deposit of a single village. But the shell-heaps in Merigonish Harbor were the largest in the locality that had not been ransacked, a summary of the reports states, and were sufficiently typical to afford much knowledge of the culture of the aboriginal coast dwellers along this part of the Atlantic seaboard. Most of the shell-heaps found were in sheltered places, some on southern shores and others on islands.

A detailed investigation of the heaps was undertaken to compare the culture of the Algonkian Indians of the Maritime Provinces with the culture of the Iroquois Indians of Ontario, one of whose villages had been previously excavated.

Earlier investigators, it is reported, had suggested that the Eskimo may have inhabited this region. Mr. Smith asserts, however, that while a few Eskimos may have visited these prehistoric Micmac sites and that the Micmacs may have obtained some objects and ideas from them, such as the toggle points for harpoons, they did not live here.

This is the car which all Hudson's past achievements are set aside to produce. That fact alone speaks for a remarkable development. When you see and ride in it you will understand that an entirely new standard of motor value has been established.

It genuinely questions the wisdom of paying more for any car.

SULGRAVE MANOR SEEN AS IN WASHINGTONS' DAY

Wing of the Old English House Has Been Rebuilt With All the Appearance of Age, and New Beauties Have Been Added to the Grounds and the Interior

By HAYDEN CHURCH.

SULGRAVE, England.

SULGRAVE MANOR, home of the English ancestors of George Washington, emerged recently from an extensive process of embellishment. This has been the most important renovation that the fine old sixteenth century residence has undergone since it was bought in 1914 by the British Committee for the Celebration of the Hundred Years' Peace Between Great Britain and the United States, in order that it might be maintained "as a place of pilgrimage for Americans in England and a symbol of the kinship of the two peoples."

As a result of nearly two years of painstaking work, and at a cost of more than $50,000, the Northamptonshire home of the Washingtons, which, when originally bought by the peace centenary committee, was in an indifferent state of repair and lacking many of its beauties owing to a process of "modernization," has been enlarged to what was probably its original size, and the entire north wing of the house, comprising some of its most interesting rooms, which of necessity had been previously closed to visitors, has been restored as nearly as possible to its original condition, as a preliminary to being thrown open to the public.

Grounds Beautified.

Simultaneously, the attractiveness of the grounds of Sulgrave has been enhanced by the addition of a memorial orchard, the gift of an American father and mother in commemoration of a much-loved son, and the whole estate has been beautified further by notable improvements both inside and outside the manor house. As a consequence, future visitors to Sulgrave will see more of the historic and beautiful place, and the whole of it in a state of greater loveliness and charm, than any of their predecessors have been able to.

Utilizing a fund of $52,500 raised in the United States in 1927, the Sulgrave Manor Board, during the last two years, has entirely reconstructed a wing to the west of the centre porch of the manor house, which is known to have been pulled down during the eighteenth century. This reconstructed wing—the building of which in scrupulous harmony with the remainder of the house was entrusted to Sir Reginald Blomfield, R. A., one of England's foremost architects—has provided new living quarters for the resident steward and caretaker of the manor, Frederick Carter. Previously, for want of other accommodation on the premises, Mr. Carter and his family had been lodged in the north wing, which dates back to the seventeenth century and is one of the most interesting parts of the fascinating old place.

The transfer of the Carters and their goods and chattels freed this part of the manor house, and during the whole of last Summer and Autumn skilled workmen were engaged in restoring it, as nearly as possible, to the state it was in when occupied by the English Washingtons.

The rooms thus made available for inspection include the wonderful old flagged kitchen of the mansion; the "oak room," or parlor, whose floor, walls and ceiling, now carefully restored, are all of this fine wood; and three bedrooms, each a real gem of seventeenth century architecture. By the time this year's American "invasion" of England begins, it is hoped, all these rooms will be furnished and equipped with the same historical accuracy, perfect taste and loving care as the dining hall, the great chamber and the other apartments of the old house (each of them containing mementos of either George Washington himself or his English forebears) which have been shown to visitors in years past.

The Memorial Orchard.

Another new and attractive feature of Sulgrave Manor, which, although actually in existence last year, will have attained to infinitely greater charm in the coming Spring, and particularly during the coming Summer, and thereafter will increase in beauty with the years, is the memorial orchard presented by Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Sherrerd of New York in memory of their son, Thomas Sherrerd.

This orchard, which has been planted with apple trees, and in which, last Spring, hundreds of Spring flowers and perennials were sown, covers about three acres and has been christened "Madame's Close." It is entered by an ornamental gateway and is enclosed by a hedge of English yew. At the end of the centre pathway is a memorial bench, bearing the name of Thomas Sherrerd.

Within a few years no one but an expert will be able to tell that the reconstructed west wing of the manor house—without which the mansion had a rather unbalanced appearance—was not always part of it. Sir Reginald Blomfield, in preparing his plans, sought to visualize the building as it was left by the Washington family.

Externally the addition is so completely in keeping with the opposite wing of the house that the appearance is given of sturdy old age. The new wing was built partially of the stone taken from old buildings in the neighborhood. The roof is of stone slates having the dull color of age. There is even moss on them. There are irregular patches of plaster on the old wing, but these have not been copied, as the effect already obtained with stone could not be bettered and the foliage of creeping plants will quickly neutralize the trifling difference between the two wings.

The restoration of the old north wing of Sulgrave, vacated by the resident steward, has been a long and laborious task, but it has been carried out with great success.

The first visitor to see the rooms as restored was Ambassador Dawes, who visited the Manor House the day after the last workman quit the place.

Aubiquarian Features.

The north apartments are a delight to the eye and of great antiquarian interest, especially the old kitchen. The most interesting feature of the restored kitchen is the ancient "meat-jack." This is a contrivance with a steel framework, entirely handmade, fitted with wires running over a pulley attached to a stone weight, which, in turn, worked the various kinds of spits (also to be seen) on which meats were roasted while revolving before the fire. This meat-jack, which came from another old house in the neighborhood, is complete in every detail except for the handle with which it was wound up. Sulgrave is one of the few places in England in which a meat-jack is now to be seen in its proper position.

The "oak room," or parlor of the north wing, as now restored, is another feast for the eye. The walls, ceiling and floor of this room, all of rich dark oak, which had been almost entirely hidden under paint, have been entirely uncovered and polished. When oak furniture, such as one already sees in the great chamber, has been added, the effect will be greatly heightened.

All of the many cupboards of these rooms, fitted with oak doors, have also been restored. In passing, the resident steward remarked that the oak flooring of the entire wing had withstood the wear and tear of three centuries so well that only in two small places have parts of it had to be replaced. The bedrooms, now spick and span, call for no special comment except that their restored dormer windows command charming vistas of the grounds and rose gardens of the manor.

Another of the wonders of the restored Sulgrave is its lawns, which, although they replaced bare fields so recently as in 1921, might to all appearance have been cultivated for centuries. They and the gardens are bordered by English yew, and in the grounds are several small yew trees, clipped in the shape of peacocks, one of which was planted by William H. Taft, the first ex-President of the United States to visit the manor, and another by the late Colonel George Harvey, while American Ambassador to the Court of St. James's. On one side of the manor house ivy has been planted that was brought from Mount Vernon.

The Best View.

The charm of the restored Sulgrave can perhaps best be realized from the Memorial Orchard. When one stands in its centre the home of the Washingtons, a gabled, ivy-covered building of two stories, rises in plain and dignified outline. Everything seems to belong to an England of the past. A modern barn, built in 1850, which previously spoiled the illusion, has been pulled down long since. Fronting the house are two majestic elms. In the near distance is the square, embattled tower of the church in which the builder of Sulgrave Manor, Lawrence Washington, and his wife, Amy, lie at rest. The village of Sulgrave, a few hundred yards away, is a quiet Northamptonshire hamlet, without a railway station, and its population of barely 300 rarely sees a motor bus.

The number of visitors to Sulgrave, the majority of them from the United States, but many of them, too, from all parts of Great Britain and the British Empire, is now well over 10,000 a year. The tide of these is naturally greatest during the Spring and Summer, but even in the Winter there is scarcely a day that does not bring at least one party of visitors to this quiet corner of Northamptonshire. In one recent fortnight, the entries in the visitors' book show, Sulgrave was seen by people from places as far apart as San Francisco and County Clare, Ireland.

INTELLECTUAL COOPERATION OF THE AMERICAS IS SOUGHT

Havana Congress Will Extend Further Cultural Contacts Between Students

THE seventh session of the Inter-American Congress of Rectors, Deans and Educators now being held at Havana, Cuba, will discuss what has been accomplished to date toward intellectual cooperation among the Americas and will suggest further extensions of cultural contacts.

The Division of Intellectual Cooperation of the Pan American Union at Washington has compiled the documentary information for the congress. Underlying the expressed projects of the congress is a far-reaching plan for a better degree of cultural unity in the Western Hemisphere, which will make as well for further economic solidarity and community of interest.

The Inter-American Institute of Intellectual Cooperation plans to establish a national council in each of the countries represented in the congress and to coordinate the work of these councils in a Central Office of Intellectual Cooperation. Each national council would plan to work with universities, academies, institutions, museums, libraries and other bodies devoted to the advancement of the arts, letters, sciences and professions in each country concerned.

Each national council would have the responsibility of collecting information relative to the institutions of their respective countries and the facilities afforded to foreign professors, students and research workers, and furnishing it to the central office or the other national councils, each of which would in turn receive and disseminate similar information. The active exchange of professors, students, research workers and special investigators would be promoted also. In general each national council would act as a liaison between the intellectual elements of their respective countries and those of other American republics.

For the present the Division of Intellectual Cooperation of the Pan American Union is the proposed central office.

Subjects of Study.

The importance of the study of the languages, literature, history and geography of all the Americas is stressed as having primary importance in establishing a unity of culture in the Western Hemisphere. Along with these subjects the comparative study of commercial and civil law is suggested as well as the study of pre-Columbian and contemporary civilizations of the American continents.

Plans for active intellectual cooperation are based on the interchange of professors and students and the recognition of degrees. Twenty such inter-American treaties have been signed and have been in force for several years. Among these the oldest is the treaty of friendship and alliance signed by Guatemala and Salvador in Santa Ana on May 8, 1876, which gives professional rights in practice and recognizes credits and university degrees of the other country.

The latest of these treaties is an agreement on mutual recognition of professional degrees and certificates of studies between Colombia and Costa Rica. It was signed in San José on Oct. 13, 1926. In one instance a treaty on the practice of liberal professions was signed by Bolivia, Chile, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Peru and Salvador.

University and government regulations on the admission of foreign students and the acceptance of foreign diplomas has been documented for the Inter-American Congress. The University of Buenos Aires recognizes work done at the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, and has an interchange of students with the University of North Dakota. The University of Chile has an agreement with the University of California. The Summer School of the National University of Mexico in 1929 made an arrangement with the University of Texas by which students in the latter university can secure credit for studies taken in the Summer School in Mexico.

In the United States the survey shows that each institution establishes its own entrance requirements and that generally the foreign student is admitted on the same terms as the native.

Scholarships Offered.

The present number of scholarships and fellowships available is limited. Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Mexico, Peru, the United States and Uruguay offer them, and more than forty colleges and universities in the United States offer free tuition to students from other American republics, while twelve others grant scholarships which cover part expenses. Several institutions offer free tuition and maintenance in return for teaching in the Spanish departments. There is one scholarship open to graduate students of the University of Buenos Aires and several for students of the National University of Mexico. The John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation in 1929 made a gift of $1,000,000 for fellowships for Mexico and some of the countries of South America.

The American Association of University Women established a Latin-American fellowship in 1917 which has been held successively by fellows from Venezuela, Porto Rico, Chile, Mexico and Argentina. The Institute of International Education, whose headquarters are in New York, and the Inter-American Foundation of Claremont, Cal., are also promoting contracts and cultural interchange of the American nations.

In an effort to give students the point of view of other countries, members of the American Historical Association of the United States have formed the Inter-American Historical Commission, which is preparing English translations of histories in accepted use in the other American republics.

In the last ten years the following cooperative movements among the American republics have been active: Governmental relations, international law, conferences of municipalities, general science, archaeology, geography and history, chemistry, agriculture, architecture, medicine and health, social welfare, women's interests, chiefly promoting civil and political equality; education, journalism, bibliography, communications, including postal, aeronautical, railway and highway interests, and lastly commerce and finance.

INDIAN'S MOCCASIN STILL IS WORN BY THE AMERICAN

MANY thousands of pairs of moccasins are sold annually to vacation-going Americans, particularly in the northern and western parts of the country. Originated and used by the Indians in all seasons and all weathers, the moccasin has become for the "paleface" a bedroom comfort. Travelers, particularly women, find the moccasin a most satisfactory kind of footwear to take along in place of the high-heeled boudoir slipper which requires more room in a bag. The moccasin is pliant and can be tucked in anywhere.

There is an endless variety of moccasins offered, depending on the section of the country in which they are obtained. In Canada one sees the moccasin fashioned entirely of light-colored seal, beautifully soft and silky. Here and there are found suède moccasins in blues and pinks, luxuriously edged with soft fur and elaborately beaded. There are some in pure white—tiny ones to fit a small baby, as well as the larger sizes. The cheaper and more common, of course, are the light tan leather, but they are not to be scorned. They will stand long, hard usage.

Some moccasins are still made in Indian communities, though the majority are fashioned in factories. Some of the factory workmen are descended from Indians.

The original style of Indian moccasins, made of buckskin, which were laced high around the ankles to keep the snow out, are still being manufactured. Some are beaded, while others have toe ornaments of dyed porcupine quills. It is difficult to obtain these.

FIRST STEAM FOG HORN TO GET DIESEL ENGINE

THE Partridge Island light and fog signal station at the entrance to St. John, N. B., harbor, said to be the first steam-operated fog alarm in the world, will in the near future derive its power from modern semi-Diesel engines. In adopting this modern power the station may again lay claim to priority, for it will be the first of the kind in Canada. Other stations depending on oil engines have only internal combustion motors utilizing gasoline as a starting mixture and operating on kerosene as a regular fuel.

The light on Partridge Island was established in 1791, and the fog signal in 1859.

SOCIAL RESEARCH SCHOOL TO HAVE A NEW BUILDING

Institution Which Holds Education Must Be Continuous Through Life Plans Ultra-Modern Structure to Care For Expansion—The Spread of Adult Study

By CLYDE BEALS.

NEW YORK'S New School for Social Research is starting construction this month of a unique building for adult education. A decade ago such an announcement might have seemed of purely local interest, a fantastic dream, perhaps, for gilding an already well-adorned citizenry. In fact, at the time the New School was actually begun, eleven years ago, by a group led by Professor Charles A. Beard, interest in the venture was only mild, while the fact that Professor Beard was resigning from Columbia University aroused much comment.

Today the project for the building has international interest. For the immature groping for culture that once gave us the Chautauqua and then correspondence school courses has been coming of age. Conservative colleges and universities have admitted the notion to respectability and begun to cultivate it. Psychological research has speeded the movement by making a complete about face on the view of a mind's potentialities. Formerly the path was blocked by a stone wall erected by William James when he said:

"Outside of their own business, the ideas gained by men before they are 25 are practically the only ideas they shall have in their lives. They cannot get anything new. Disinterested curiosity is past, the mental grooves and channels set, the power of assimilation gone."

Education at Any Age.

Today the prevailing view is that announced by Professor E. L. Thorndike of Columbia University, after two years of research. While, as he says, the peak of learning ability comes at about 22, he also concluded that: "Adult education suffers no mystical handicap because of the age of the students. * * * The decline is so slow—it may roughly be thought of as 1 per cent per year—that persons under 50 should seldom be deterred from trying to learn anything that they really need to learn by the fear that they are too old. And to a lesser degree this is true after 50, also. * * * We might better replace 'childhood is the time for learning' by 'the time for learning anything is the time when you need it.'"

The movement is so widespread in the United States that there are now twice as many adults taking regular education courses as there are students in colleges and universities. Nor is the conception springing up in this country alone. Last year, under British auspices and on the venerable grounds of Cambridge University, representatives of a number of countries held the first world conference on adult education.

The New School for Social Research, at Tenth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, is founded on the theory, according to Dr. Alvin Johnson, the director, that education should be a lifelong process. A mind, he says, does not "stay educated." It tends to lose its alertness if not kept in shape with gymnastics. And, on the other hand, the school's experience shows that most mature minds are competent to acquire learning if the interest is there. College and non-college persons, he says, can start the process on even terms, even in middle life, for the experience of living will have rendered them about equal.

Widespread changes in American life and the attitude toward it, Dr. Johnson says, have helped to mark out the work of the New School. While it avoids letting itself become merely a means of filling idle leisure, it recognizes that the growth of leisure has stimulated the desire to spend it profitably. Hand in hand with this development has come the spread of education among youth and the corresponding desire on the part of many parents not to be outstripped by their children.

And, perhaps, most influential of all, is the new development in educational method, the recognition that a young man looks to his college to equip him for quick progress in a vocation, which has meant that he must take the specialized courses to the exclusion of the cultural. When he has passed 25 or 30, and the first serious brush with workaday life begins to ease, he tends to turn back and pick up the culture that had to be missed.

The New Building.

The new building—to be in Twelfth Street between Fifth and Sixth Avenues—has been designed to make that turn easy. To a remarkable extent it embodies the school's conception. Its design represented from the first a complete meeting of the minds between architect and director. Joseph Urban, whose reputation rests at least partly on his liberalism in architecture, was called upon, and he regards the design as his best. From his first meeting with Dr. Johnson, he says, it was not difficult to catch the spirit and meaning of the New School.

"We soon found we had much in common; that we talked the same language, in philosophy, in art, and in our attitude toward modern life. When I left him after our first conversation, I had the architectural vision of the New School pretty well in mind."

Dr. Johnson wanted a front which, whatever else it did, would attract attention and arouse the interest of whoever saw it. Mr. Urban produced a bold modernistic one, a sort of crystal cube, mostly of glass in broad horizontal bands with layers of masonry between; and the bulk of it made to stand out boldly by a deep recessed frame of dark material at both sides and the top.

Besides this, it was to be built with a recognition of the normal hesitancy people have about entering strange places. Mr. Urban's design puts the main auditorium on the ground floor within easy access of the general public, so that a casual visitor can attend a lecture there without feeling himself conspicuous. On the floors just above are slightly smaller, though still large, lecture rooms, for the visitor to whom the newness has partly worn off; and so the intimacy increases, until on the top floor the visitor, by that time become a regular student, can take off his coat and go to work with complete assurance.

The interior, too, presents new architectural features that harmonize with the purposes of the school. The auditorium, Mr. Urban says, represents a design that has long been known to be the most nearly perfect for acoustics but that has not yet been tried before. It is in the shape of an egg, which, besides avoiding disturbances from the sound, he says, accommodates the best seating arrangement with the greatest unity of surface. Here, too, the idea of putting the lecturer on the closest possible terms with his audience is to be tried.

The proscenium has been carried out into the auditorium, concealed lights will make him readily visible without throwing a glare into any one's eyes, and no decorative effects beyond the sheer symmetry of the architecture will be introduced to distract attention.

The same ideas of comfort combined with utility have governed in the other details. Light from the front windows is not to be cut off by the usual supporting columns along the walls; instead, the columns are to be set inside so that the light can penetrate more deeply into the building. The entire tier of windows is to be double, so as to keep out noise and simplify the heating; ventilating and heating systems will have openings in chambers between the panes, and artificial lighting will come from this space and be refracted through a kind of glass etched with acid, which will provide the whole room with much the same as the soft, cool light of day.

The New School is to have what is referred to as a "mind extension institute." Dr. Johnson and his associates have concluded that much aid could be given to persons of about 35 years or older by making an "intelligence inventory," showing what are the assets left in their minds which they could profitably develop. Dr. Johnson compares the ordinary individual to a soldier going off to a training camp: the graduate starts to work on leaving college carrying with him many superfluous items, which in the stress of life he gradually discards, until he has reduced his pack to nothing but essentials. But some of the items lingering in the mind might have paid good returns, in pleasure, if not in actual profit, if developed, and the New School hopes to find these latent talents or interests and put them to work.

New developments in current life are to be met by new courses. The availability of Saturday as a free day for many workers is to be welcomed by week-end college courses; the entrance of movies into private life, so to speak, brings a course on the art of taking them; the emergence of artistic dancing is signalized by classes; in fact, the whole program of offerings, both of those already existing and those only awaiting the new building—to open Oct. 1, if the plans are carried through—teems with items fully abreast of today's affairs.

There are already more than 400 groups in the country engaged in adult education; there is an American Association for Adult Education, which publishes a quarterly journal and acts as godfather to groups struggling to get started, and which has a "recommendatory privilege" with the Carnegie Corporation of New York City through which it can obtain grants of financial aid; and the American Library Association is helping along the work by issuing a quarterly entitled "Adult Education and the Library."

Now the colleges are becoming increasingly active, particularly as a means of keeping in better touch with their alumni. Too much alumni loyalty has spent itself in the football grandstands, the colleges feel, and not enough is done to keep alive the acquaintanceship begun in undergraduate years. Many colleges have lately been making inquiries among their alumni as to what the faculty could supply, and are devising reading prospectuses and the like to help them keep up with events.

FAMOUS OLD MAINE MANSION YIELDS LIGHT ON OUR HISTORY

Newly Discovered Letters Contain Remarks About Leaders in the Revolution

NEW material concerning the Colonial history of Northern New England has just been brought to light by Professor William Otis Sawtelle of Haverford, Pa., as a result of a search through the attic of the old Black mansion at Ellsworth, Me. The papers consist largely of the correspondence of William Bingham, a famous landed proprietor, and other notables of his day, some of whom were officers on Washington's staff.

The Black mansion has long been one of the show places of Eastern Maine. It was built more than a century ago by General David Cobb, who was Eastern agent for the vast Bingham estate. Eventually it passed into the hands of George Nixon Black of Boston, the last of his line, who died a year ago, bequeathing it to the Hancock County Trustees of Public Reservations. After its acceptance last August it was opened as a museum. Since then it has drawn thousands of visitors from all over the United States, many of whom have come to see its stately old furniture and fittings.

Recently the trustees authorized Professor Sawtelle, one of their number, to explore the mansion for historical treasures and he found the manuscripts, which are in an excellent state of preservation. They include long-sought replies by General Cobb to letters written him by William Bingham, whose title to the lands came from the British crown. Hitherto, only Bingham's side of the correspondence has been known.

Reference is made in the letters of both men, to many famous figures of the Colonial Revolutionary periods, including Thomas William of Philadelphia, partner of Robert Morris, the banker, who largely financed the War for Independence; General Henry Knox, Washington's Chief of Artillery; and General Henry Jackson and other American officers who, after the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, turned their attention to land speculation in Eastern Maine. Incidentally, the failure of William Duer, one of these speculators, precipitated one of the early financial panics in New York City.

Under William Bingham's will the great tract of Maine forest land known as the Bingham Purchase, was left to a self-perpetuating board of trustees. Included in the membership of the first board were Alexander and Henry Baring, founders of the London banking house of Baring Brothers.

YOUNG MAN-EATING SHARKS TAKE KINDLY TO CAPTIVITY

Bermuda Aquarium Obtains Three of Species Feared by Bathers in Tropical Waters

HAMILTON, Bermuda.

PROBABLY the first man-eating sharks ever to be kept alive in captivity are now to be seen at the Bermuda Aquarium. They are of the species sometimes known popularly as the puppy shark, but science knows them as Carcharhinus limbatus, and describes them as having a range from Brazil north to Florida. The taking of three specimens in Bermuda waters shows them to come at least a few hundred miles farther north.

Two species of shark are often seen in aquariums—one known as the sand shark or Ginglymostoma cirratum, and the other Carcharias littoralis. It has generally been found impossible to keep in captivity any of the species that have become familiar to the general public from stories of accidents to bathers in tropical waters. Louis L. Mowbray, curator of the Bermuda Aquarium and formerly curator of several aquariums in the United States, including that at New York, says he has tried to keep alive at least a hundred specimens of sharks, and has failed because of the difficulty of getting them to a tank alive.

Louis Mowbray Jr., assistant curator, was fishing over the reefs that surround the islands of Bermuda, when he felt his line being carried away by a powerful fish. Its movements seemed to be very different from those of the ordinary fish when hooked, and it was much more "game." He played it for a long time, and when he was nearly exhausted managed to get it to the surface, "played out" after a game fight. Then he saw that it was a small shark, about three feet long.

The shark was raised by the line and dropped immediately into the tank in the well of the boat. The boat used by the Bermuda Aquarium for fishing expeditions is equipped with a tank considerably above the average size, which proved particularly useful in this case.

SUBWAY SINGER IS NOW WITH US

TO the bathtub singer, the apartment house courtyard guitar-and-banjo-on-Sunday-morning warbler and other such nuisances has been added the subway singer. She—it is usually a she—is generally young and romantic. She holds in front of her a huge pink sheet which takes up space in crowded cars.

On this sheet, one reads, are 150 song hits, price 5 cents. The singer is intent on memorizing the words—there is no music on the sheet—of "Hello Baby" or "Red Hot Mamma." She is probably preparing for the time when, dancing with her favorite "boy friend," the orchestra strikes up the tune of one of these soul-stirring melodies and she can sing the words to him.

CONTROL OF UTILITIES AGAIN A STATE ISSUE

To Meet Conditions Emphasized by Power Discussion and the Telephone Rate Case, the System in Use for Twenty-Odd Years Is Studied for Revision

By W. A. WARN.

ALBANY.

THE relationship between the State and public utility corporations, or as Governor Roosevelt defines them, "the servants of the State in the utility field," has become an outstanding theme of debate at the Capitol through the water power issue and the telephone rate case. The water power problem gives promise of an earlier solution than any one had dared dream of only a few weeks ago. But in the realization of the State's project of publicly developed hydroelectric energy new and more stringent methods of regulation will be called for. The recent attempt of the New York Telephone Company, backed by a Federal court decision, to go over the heads of the Public Service Commission in the enforcement of new rate schedules that involve substantial increases in the cost of telephone service served further to emphasize the State's concern with utilities control.

Thus the whole question of regulation is as sharply in the foreground now as it was when Charles Evans Hughes, upon assuming office as Governor in 1907, demanded new and more effective machinery for the control of public service corporations.

The result of Governor Hughes's demand upon the Legislature was the establishment of the present system of public utility regulation through Public Service Commissions. The proposal was fought by the corporations and regarded by many with no corporation connection as a daring and dangerous innovation. But within a decade the example of New York was followed by nearly every State in the Union. Governor Hughes forcibly impressed upon hostile lawmakers and embattled corporations that if his proposal was rejected nothing short of public ownership would insure the treatment to the public that the public would determine was its due. He declared bluntly that the old regulatory machinery had broken down.

The Hughes Plea Repeated.

This same plea, applied to the present system of regulation, is now being repeated in important official quarters on Capitol Hill. In the twenty-two years that have passed since the present plan of regulation became operative there have been decisions of the courts and encroachments by Federal authority to create vast twilight zones within which the regulatory powers of State boards and commissions have been reduced to a mere shadow. That is true especially with regard to the regulation of railroad operation.

There is another, and, perhaps, more general and potent cause for the breakdown charged against the regulatory system of today. In some States the regulatory function is exercised by elective boards or commissions; in others by bodies appointed by the Governor. In either event, it is said that in many Commonwealths public utility corporations have been in a position to control elections and political parties.

A situation has thus developed wherein, instead of governments controlling public utilities, the utility corporations have gained control over government. No one maintains that this has particular application in this State, but advocates of a change in the present system in the interest of more stringent methods of regulation realize that it is a condition to be reckoned with.

A few figures will indicate the magnitude of interests subject to regulation by the Public Service Commission in this State. Excluding steam railroads and express companies doing an inter-State business and only partly under control of the commission, the aggregate capitalization of public utility corporations in this State, according to the 1928 report of the Public Service Commission, was $4,536,674,999. The combined assets against which the securities had been issued were stated in the same report to be $5,762,274,012.

During the last five years, from 1925 to 1930, the commission passed upon additional capitalization for corporations subject to regulation, up to a total of $1,168,834,762.

The Telephone Rate Case.

The present telephone controversy has brought sharply before Governor Roosevelt one of the handicaps to be overcome before the State will have a free hand in the regulation of its public utilities. The conflict has been in progress since 1923. In the interval of years the New York Telephone Company demonstrated to the Public Service Commission, to its satifaction on three occasions at least, that it was entitled to an increase in rates. On each occasion substantial increases were granted, but not enough to satisfy the company, with the result that relief was sought in the courts. Not in the State courts, however, but in the Federal courts. It was through the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York that the company was awarded a rate base which it holds in justification for its recent increased rate schedules.

Before the telephone rate controversy culminated in the present deadlock between the commission and the company, which probably will throw the rate question again into the courts, the Governor already had reached the conclusion that the present plan of utility control by the State had inherent defects. He arrived at that conclusion in the course of his study of the water power problem.

His predecessor, Alfred E. Smith, considering the same subject, had become convinced also that under the present system of regulation, economies effected by the State power development on the St. Lawrence might not be passed on to the householders for whose benefit the State is going into the hydroelectric business.

While the State is to develop the power at its own plant, if the State power project is realized, transmission lines controlled by private interests would be used for distribution of the current to the consumers. Therefore, both Governor Smith and his successor, Governor Roosevelt, in the water power bills presented by them to successive Legislatures, made provision for the fixing of rates through contracts and for administration of plant and regulation of distribution through some body other than the Public Service Commission.

A Commission Studies the Law.

The Public Service Commission, to the Governor's way of thinking, is on the defensive, less by its administration of the law entrusted to its keeping than by defects in the law itself. A legislative commission, headed by John Knight, president-pro-tempore of the Senate, has been studying the law since the 1929 session of the Legislature adjourned, trying to cure its defects. Hopes are not high at the Capitol that the remedial legislation which this commission is expected to recommend will go far enough to meet the views of Governor Roosevelt.

While Governor Roosevelt has determined to await the report of the Knight Commission before setting forth in detail his own views, he is turning over in his mind a number of suggestions made by persons in whose judgment he has confidence—men who have given expert study to the problem of rendering public utility control more effective. He has been seriously considering the establishment of a system of transmission trunk lines to be owned by the State, even though privately operated under contract, embodying an ironclad agreement with reference to rates and service.

The Governor believes that with the mighty volume of power to be yielded by the St. Lawrence the present high-tension distributing lines, controlled by private interests, will prove inadequate, and that a replacement will consequently be inevitable.

Cost of the Project.

The cost has been variously estimated, but $200,000,000 has been accepted as a conservative figure. With the ability of the State to borrow money much more cheaply than private borrowers, the Governor is inclined to believe that it would be a good thing for the State to finance and retain title to the new distributing system, letting it to some private operator. For one thing, as he views it, an annual saving in interest of from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000 would result, from which, under proper contracts, the consumers would benefit.

As to public utilities already established, the Governor has given no indication that he would favor a change from private to public ownership. He believes that the better way is to provide for effective regulation.

Among the more conservative measures suggested are amendments to the Public Service Commissions law that would give the commission the largest possible measure of control over holding companies and so-called allied service companies; and legislation by Congress to compel public utility corporations to exhaust the means for relief obtainable through State courts before going to Federal tribunals.

Other and more drastic changes that have been urged are substitution of rate-making by contract for the present method of regulation by orders from the Public Service Commission, or mutualization of public utility corporations.

The Governor's Attitude.

Governor Roosevelt is keeping his own counsel when various methods for putting more force into public utility regulation are brought up. His attitude with regard to water-power regulation, however, is a matter of public record and his friends say there have been other indications of his leaning toward the proposal for regulation through contract.

Advocates of this method, while not blind to the difficulties involved, profess to see many advantages in it. Regulatory contracts would embody not only exact agreements as to rates to be charged, but a definite statement, agreed upon by the State on one hand and the corporations on the other, as to the method of financing and the return on the capital used and useful in the corporation's public utility business.

They would embody also a close definition of the elements, including money to be set aside to meet depreciation and for a reserve against a shrinkage in earnings, which would be allowed as factors in the base upon which rates are calculated. In order to provide against changes affecting the earning capacity of the companies, there could be embodied clauses providing for reconsideration of rates at given intervals.

Everything would thus be in black and white, including the basic elements for determining earnings and rates.

"At present," Governor Roosevelt said recently, "there are two important main phases of public utility relations with the State, as the creator of public utilities, that call for consideration.

"The first phase involves the drawing of a perfectly definite line of procedure, separating the Federal jurisdiction from the State's jurisdiction and restoring to the State courts, and vesting in them only, the right to review public utility rates, leaving open only an appeal to the United States Supreme Court after our own Court of Appeals has passed upon a question.

A Re-study of the Question.

"The second phase is far broader. We have got so far away from the common law theory of what a public utility is entitled to earn on the private capital invested therein and so far away from Governor Hughes and his original intention when the Public Service Commissions were created in 1907, that we are forced to make a complete re-study of the entire question of relationship.

"This new study necessarily would include much needed changes in the regulatory method of the Public Service Commission and the law under which that body operates, and also of the desirability of new forms of contract between the State and its servants, the public utility companies."

Governor Roosevelt said that fixation of rates in the charters of public utility companies or concerns went back as far as Queen Elizabeth.

"The old ferry plying on the Hudson between Beacon and Newburgh," the Governor said, "received its charter under Queen Anne, awarded to the Powell family, for a member of which the old steamer Mary Powell, which until a few years ago carried passengers between New York City and Newburgh, was named. This charter fixed a certain rate, figured on a basis where it would not enrich but insure a fair profit to the owners. There was no question there of valuation, except on a basis of actual investment.

"But today the cry is not only for a fair return on the original investment, but on appreciation as well. That may be all right where a private corporation is concerned, but as I see it, a public utility corporation enjoying a natural monopoly under the protection of the State, is on a different footing."

Prior to the establishment under Governor Hughes of the machinery now in existence for the regulation and control of public utility corporations, including financing, rates and operations, a condition existed which made the Legislature, in effect, the arbiter in the fixing of rates.

A Division of Authority.

The railroads were subject to regulation by the State Railroad Commission, composed of five members; but the board itself was not vested with authority to institute and conduct legal proceedings for the purpose of enforcing its orders.

A State commission of gas and electricity exercised broader regulatory power over gas and electric utilities, but again the final decision as to rates rested with the Legislature. Telephones were not under State supervision then, nor did they become subject to such regulation until after the new Public Service Commissions had been in operation for two or three years.

In the New York City transit field the supervisory power was much divided. Governor Hughes, in his recommendations, which a most reluctant body of lawmakers was compelled by public sentiment to adopt, urged that the slate be wiped clean through the abolition of all existing regulatory bodies of the State in the utility field and that two Public Service Commissions be created, one to exercise the State's authority in the New York City transit field and the other to regulate railroads outside of New York City, and in addition all other utilities subject to public regulation.

This is our present system of regulation and control under a statute which now for the first time is being generally overhauled.

It is not expected that the Knight commission will recommend any revolutionary change in the method of regulation. Some recommendations with a bearing on the independence of holding companies is expected and it is the general contention among experts that in this respect a radical change is needed, although it may require action by Congress, as well as the Legislature, before it can be effected. The so-called allied service companies, often creatures of the utility corporations, which furnish them with supplies and material, also present a problem, because, not being essentially public utilities concerns, they are not now regulated by the Public Service Commission.

The New York Telephone Company affords an example. Its stock is owned by the American Telegraph and Telephone Company which, doing an interstate business, is subject to control by the Interstate Commerce Commission, not the Public Service Commission. The Western Electric Company also enters disturbingly into the telephone complex as the owner of patents and as dealer in equipment supplied to the New York Telephone Company.

The cost to the telephone company of its supplies the Public Service Commission is in a position to ascertain through its power to examine the books of that corporation; but the profits made by the Western Electric, which have been called inordinate, are a closed book to the commission. The Western Electric is not a utility corporation. And yet the question of profits enters very largely as a factor in determining whether the rates of the telephone company are fair and equitable.

THREE BOY SCOUT COUNCILS RECEIVE CAMP SITE DEEDS

More Than 50,000 Acres Valued at $4,000,000 Now Belong to Scouts in This Country

LAND for three Boy Scout camps has been deeded to local councils of the Boy Scouts by citizens of Belleville, Ill., Minneapolis, Minn., and Marion, Ohio, according to word received at the national offices of the Boy Scouts of America in New York. Reports of the national camping department state that local councils of the Boy Scout movement now own a total of more than 50,000 acres of camp land with a valuation in excess of $4,000,000. Of these Scout camps, those of the councils representing the five boroughs of New York are among the largest.

A fifty-four-acre island in Bay Lake, near Aitkin, Minn., has been presented to the Minneapolis area Boy Scout Council by Frank S. Gold, its president. Formal acknowledgment of the gift has been made by the Boy Scout Council of Minneapolis.

The island, to be known as the Isle of Pines, was purchased by Mr. Gold from Carter Adams, a mining operator, as a gift for the Boy Scouts. It has one of the finest stands of pine and other timber of any tract in the State and the lake in which it lies is described by Mr. Gold as a miniature Lake Minnetonka, with many small islands, bays and inlets. The lake is 128 miles from Minneapolis and is in the centre of the Minnesota lake district.

Camp John A. Owens, recreation centre for the Boy Scouts of Harding Area Council, with headquarters at Marion, Ohio, is to become the property of the organization under deed to the Scouts from its present owner, C. A. Owens, Marion manufacturer.

This camp site, comprising sixty acres of ground, is given to the Scouts as a memorial to perpetuate the memory of his son, John, who died several years ago, Mr. Owens anounced. Twenty acres of wooded ground are included in the site, which has been used by Boy Scouts for several years.

To the Boy Scout Council of the Belleville, Ill., area there has been presented a twenty-seven-acre tract on Fountain Creek, near Waterloo, Ill., for use as a permanent Summer camp. The tract was presented to the Scouts by I. H. Wangelin, former postmaster at Belleville. The property is valued at approximately $1,500. James Swofford, Scout executive, announced that plans would be made immediately for the erection of buildings on the site, which will be known as Camp I. H. Wangelin. The cost of the buildings and equipment will be about $2,500. The property adjoins Camp Vandeventer of the East St. Louis Boy Scouts.

TAXI MEN BEAT TRAFFIC LIGHTS BY DRIVING ONE EXTRA BLOCK

NEW YORK taxi drivers have an ingenious means of beating traffic signals, a method that probably never occurs to the ordinary motorist. The latter accepts a red light stoically, until it turns green, but the professional chauffeur, whose business is speed, sometimes collects handsome dividends for saving an impatient customer two minutes' waiting time.

The scheme is particularly effective in crosstown runs, in which the stops seem long and frequent. For example, instead of waiting for a red light to change, the taxi driver makes his permissible right turn into north or southbound traffic. In the middle of the first block of the north and south street he swings about, coming back to his original crosstown street. He has crossed the street—lawfully—in the face of the red light, and can usually be trusted to be a block away, ready to make another crossing, by the time the signal changes.

As much as four or five minutes can be saved in a taxi run of average length, drivers say. And scarcely less important to a temperamental or impatient passenger—as well as to the size of a driver's tip—is the illusion of speed created by the constantly moving cab.

REAL INDOOR SUNLIGHT ELUDES THE SCIENTIST

Physicists Are Constantly Striving to Produce a Home Illuminant That Will Give Artificial Light and Artificial Ultraviolet Rays at the Same Time

By E. E. FREE.

THE dream of sunlit living places may be older than Hippocrates, but it is still a dream. In these northern latitudes and in modern, smoky cities sunlight is rare for six months of the year, even if one build houses of glass or quartz to let it in.

Recently there has arisen hope of duplicating sunlight by special kinds of artificial light indoors, so that both the visible rays of ordinary light and invisible but health-giving ultraviolet ones could be provided in proper proportion to give each family its own private Palm Beach or Pasadena. Unfortunately, this is still a hope instead of a reality. Artificial sunlight does not yet exist, which fact constitutes perhaps the greatest present opportunity of American inventors to be of service to the world.

A few days ago Dr. Matthew Luckiesh of Cleveland, one of America's foremost students of artificial light and lighting, summarized present hopes and searches for artificial sunlight before the Winter convention of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers in New York. He agreed that no practicable and exact duplicate of natural sunlight has yet been perfected. He discussed the extreme desirability of such a duplicate and some ways in which it conceivably may be produced, and he outlined fully and very fairly the present deficiencies and the hoped-for future possibilities of the so-called "sunlamp."

Some commentators have been less careful than Dr. Luckiesh to distinguish hopes from facts. It is being implied that artificial sunlight is here or that it is just around the next scientific corner, and ultraviolet lamps are urged as safe and healthful home accessories, to be used without precautions, without the advice of a physician, even without suspicion that medical knowledge is necessary.

A Pressing City Health Problem.

Discovery of the effects of ultraviolet rays on life is perhaps the greatest medical event of this century, though it was foreshadowed by the empirical sun cures and mountain cures of more than 3,000 years ago. There now seems little doubt that a substantial part of the ill health of northern city populations in the late Winter and early Spring is to be correlated with the almost complete absence of these ultraviolet rays from October to April. To provide these rays or some suitable equivalent of them is indubitably among the most pressing problems of public health in cities.

At present, if this is done at all, it is by short exposures of the individuals concerned to the rays of enormously powerful ultraviolet lamps like those used by physicians to treat actual disease. Thus to concentrate one's "sunlight dose" into a few minutes instead of days or hours seems to be possible physically; as though the body absorbed the effects of ultraviolet radiation rapidly and stored them somehow against times of deficiency. That this would be possible might have been predicted, indeed, from the familiar fact that a week or two of Winter vacation in sunny Florida or California often gives one better health for months thereafter.

Under expert care, as Dr. Auguste Rollier, Dr. Leonard Hill, Professor E. S. Russell, Dr. Edgar Mayer, E. R. Hewitt and scores of other experts have been insisting for years, ultraviolet lamps can bring unequaled benefits to unhealthy humanity. Without such expert skill the lamps are likely to be used too often, too long and too powerfully, as laymen tend always to use potent remedies. Thus they will do incalculable harm.

The Core of the Problem.

The ideal for which both physicists and physicians have been striving is what Dr. Luckiesh was discussing, a home illuminant to provide artificial light and artificial ultraviolet rays at the same time, each in proper amount and without any possible danger from overuse. Normal exposure of the average household to the mixed rays of such a lamp should keep normal people healthy during our smoky, almost sunless Winters. That, and that alone, is what "artificial sunlight" ought to mean.

Some present illuminants fail to provide this because they are too strong, others because they are too weak. Existing ultraviolet lamps fall in the too-strong class. The ordinary tungsten-filament incandescent lamp, on the other hand, is too weak, emitting only a insignificant trifle of real ultraviolet rays. By burning such tungsten lamps at very high filament temperatures and enclosing them in bulbs of quartz instead of glass, small amounts of ultraviolet rays can be produced, but these expedients seem likely to be always too expensive for general use.

This is the core of the problem which Dr. Luckiesh presented to the Institute of Electrical Engineers. How shall the electrical industry supply the American public with an indoor illuminant which provides both the necessary light to see by and the safe ultraviolet rays desirable for Winter health? That it is a problem hopeful of solution everybody agrees, but there is no use denying that it is still unsolved.

Even the physical duplication of sunlight is easier in theory than in practice. Sunlight outside the earth's atmosphere is a mixture of heat rays, visible light rays, ultraviolet rays and other rays, all emitted together by the gaseous elements of the sun's surface, heated to the temperature of about 10,000 degrees Fahrenheit. Before it can reach any spot on the earth's surface this sunlight of space is filtered through air of varying thickness and composition, so that the "natural sunlight" of New York City, for example, is really no definite thing but is a mixture of heat, light and ultraviolet rays, varying from season to season, even from hour to hour.

Nevertheless, a reasonable physical duplicate of sunlight might be obtained, in theory, by the simple expedient of heating almost anything to a temperature of 10,000 degrees Fahrenheit and then filtering the emitted light through something reasonably equivalent in optical properties to a few hundred miles of air. That would be making sunlight in the way used by Nature. The practical difficulty is precisely that of the alchemist who thought that he had discovered the universal solvent. What was he to keep it in?

Having something 10,000 degrees hot would turn every element substance in the known universe into gas. No bulb, furnace or other container could withstand it. It is not inconceivable that some totally new way can be thought of for thus producing bits of very hot material as small laboratory samples of the sun. Dr. J. A. Anderson at Mount Wilson Observatory already has produced instantaneous temperatures ranging even higher. But no practicable design for such a real duplicate of sunlight seems to have been imagined.

Progress Toward Duplication.

This throws the would-be sunlight duplicators back on some kind of synthetic sunlight; the separate production of the several different types of rays in natural sunlight and the combination of proper quantities of each of these into the hoped-for solar substitute. An electric arc in mercury vapor, for example, produces short-wavelength ultraviolet rays far more intense than ever are present in natural sunlight after it has filtered through the air. This device constitutes the familiar mercury arc invented by Peter Cooper Hewitt, the first practicable device for generating ultraviolet rays and one still in wide use in hospitals and by physicians.

Electric arcs between rods of carbon in air also produce a mixture of ultraviolet rays, visible light and a large quantity of heat rays. By incorporating various chemical elements in such carbon rods the relative percentages of light rays, heat rays and of the various kinds of ultraviolet rays may be altered widely. This provides another series of devices now sold as sources of ultraviolet and other rays.

Taking either these mercury arcs or carbon arcs and placing glass sheets of various compositions and transparencies in the path of the rays, lamp designers can filter out certain portions of the ultraviolet, visible or other rays, or can alter the relative quantities of the different radiations. One of these glass filters, totally black to the eye, passes some of the ultraviolet rays, while holding back the visible ones. Thus it provides the "black light" with which such spectacular experiments on fluorescence have been performed by Professor R. W. Wood and others.

The New Lamp.

By various combinations of such ray filters in front of different types of ray-emitting arcs it is possible to make a fair approach to the physical duplication of average sunlight. As yet, however, no one has made such a duplication really close. It is as though a would-be art student spent his first week in class copying the Sistine Madonna.

The new lamp which Dr. Luckiesh describes combines two ray-making methods already well known. Inside a bulb that looks not unlike that of an ordinary incandescent lamp is a thick, short tungsten filament. This glows as soon as the lamp is turned on. Loose in the same bulb is a globule of mercury and connected with the tungsten filament are two solid cylinders of that metal, shaped like miniature tin cans. These are the materials of a mercury arc.

An instant after the lamp is lighted the heat from the filament vaporizes some of the mercury and through this mercury vapor an arc strikes between the two tungsten cylinders, thus the lamp contains inside its single glass bulb a tungsten-filament source very weak in ultraviolet rays and a mercury-arc source very strong in these rays. In operation, the arc far outshines the filament, so that the lamp becomes essentially a variant of the original mercury-arc idea of Peter Cooper Hewitt.

An important item, however, is the glass bulb. This is of a special chemical composition, designed to stop some of the more powerful and dangerous ultraviolet rays, while allowing others to pass. The too-powerful ultraviolet radiations from the mercury arc are supposed to be reduced in severity by the filtering action of the glass bulb and are combined with a proportion of other radiations, more powerful in heat rays, from the tungsten filament and the hot surfaces of the two tungsten cylinders.

The lamp requires a lower electric voltage than the usual 110 volts of the lighting circuits, and therefore cannot be used directly in an ordinary lamp socket, but requires a special stand containing electric transformers to provide the necessary voltage; a defect of convenience which it shares, however, with all useful ultraviolet equipment known to me.

Physical measurements of the relative energy emitted in the form of visible, ultraviolet and heat rays confirm tests of the lamp's action on the human skin to show that the new lamp emits ultraviolet rays much more powerful physiologically than those in normal sunlight. Regardless of what may be the ultimate place of these lamps in medical practice, their rays are far from being physical duplicates of sunlight.

Excessive Exposure Dangerous.

No living individual has had longer or more intimate experience with ultraviolet rays than Edward R. Hewitt, distinguished New York automotive engineer and chemist, brother and former laboratory associate of Peter Cooper Hewitt, who invented the mercury arc.

"Ultraviolet light should never be used long enough to cause any redness on the skin or cause any burn or pigmentation," Mr. Hewitt writes. "All the beneficial effects of the light for general treatment can be obtained without using it to this extent."

Even natural sunlight, on that basis, might be used to excess; a conclusion indubitably true and attested by every experienced sun-cure physician. I have known Dr. Rollier to begin by exposing six square inches of a patient's foot to Alpine sunlight for five minutes during the day; gradually increasing the dose and the exposed skin area day by day as the patient gained in tolerance for the rays.

This precise physical duplication of sunlight may not be quite what is needed, anyway. What health experts really ask inventors to provide is a physiologic duplicate of sunlight, not necessarily a physical one. It matters little which rays or wave lengths are present so long as the indoor ray mixture and the natural outdoor sunlight have the same bodily effect. If a precise physical duplicate of sunlight is unobtainable or dangerous, cannot the lighting experts provide something biologically just as good?

The only possible answer is that nobody knows. The one biological effect of ultraviolet rays which is reasonably well understood—their effect in curing the children's disease called rickets—probably has little or nothing to do with the effects on general health. That such effects on general health exist is amply proved, but virtually nothing is known about their biological mechanism.

Meanwhile laymen will do well to take both natural Summer sunlight and any artificial substitutes in the small doses which Mr. Hewitt recommends. Winter sunlight, of course, is innocuous—and almost useless—for it contains in this latitude almost none of the ultraviolet rays believed importantly effective for health.

When a real artificial sunlight has been developed, adequately duplicating the bodily effects of the natural article, many people will be disappointed, I predict, because they fail to accumulate under their evening lamps the beet-like sunburn or the chocolate tan which they deem the only sign that rays are working on them.

SHIPMENTS OF JUNK ABROAD GROW TO UNEXAMPLED SIZE

Various Reasons Cause Foreign Demand for Motorcar, Horseshoe and Other Scrap

UNPRECEDENTED shipments of iron and steel scrap from the United States to foreign markets have been noted by officials of the Department of Commerce during the last two years, creating an unusual interest among domestic dealers in this somewhat unfamiliar but highly important industry. According to figures compiled by the department, 516,139 tons of scrap iron and steel, consisting of anything from old automobile junk to wire shorts, were exported in 1928, and 359,595 tons were shipped abroad in the first eight months of 1929.

In a recent paper read before the Institute of Scrap Iron and Steel in New York City, Luther Becker, chief of the iron and steel division of the Department of Commerce, analyzed the conditions abroad which account for this increased consumption of America's cast-off metal. In some instances, foreign blast furnaces are now being charged with as much as 60 per cent scrap and only 40 per cent pig iron in the manufacture of steel, owing to the scarcity of native ore in certain countries, with the resultant relative scarcity of scrap.

The largest importer of scrap from the United States is Canada, with Japan, Italy, Poland and Danzig ranking in the order named. Germany, China and France also consume large quantities of the commodity. Surveys conducted by Department of Commerce commissioners reveal that the Canadian steel industry has only recently effected a complete readjustment, with the result that her demands for scrap have increased sixfold since 1925. Last year Canada imported 178,528 tons of old iron and steel from this country.

Japanese purchases of scrap from the United States increased tremendously during this period, owing mainly to the unsettled conditions in China. The domestic iron ore resources of Japan are extremely small. China, raked by civil war, almost ceased to be a source of supply, and Japan turned to the United States. American exports of scrap to Japan increased from 8,670 gross tons in 1923 to 160,427 in 1928.

Shipments to European countries have grown because of the strike in Swedish iron mines in 1927, and by restrictions placed upon the exportation of scrap by the governments of Sweden, France, Italy and Germany. Increased production by the Polish furnaces, the partial exhaustion of Spanish iron ore and the completion of the recovery of scrap from the battlefields of Europe have been further contributing factors.

INDUSTRY OPENS AIR SHOW IN NEW ST. LOUIS ARENA

"Class A" Exposition Expected to Be Barometer for Aviation In 1930—Many Planes on View and Weighty Topics Scheduled for Engineering Meetings

By LAUREN D. LYMAN.

THE second annual International Aircraft Exposition, under the auspices of the Aeronautical Chamber of America, Inc., opened yesterday in the new arena at St. Louis and will last for eight days. In importance to the aircraft industry it will probably rank ahead of any exposition of its kind that has been held in the country, for before its conclusion next Sunday the industry expects to discover enough of the trend in aviation for 1931 as well as 1930 to allow its members to make plans.

For the last eight months at least there has been a definite pessimism and a growing feeling of dissatisfaction in both the manufacturing and transport branches of aviation. Dealers and manufacturers, airline operators and those interested in the development of airports have hoped that the first of the year would see a definite change for the better. They have found nothing of the sort so far, but at the same time their inquiries have led them to hope that with the international show things will begin to pick up. Salesmen have been told by their prospects to "wait until the St. Louis show." The exposition, it is believed, will prove a fairly accurate barometer.

The show itself, while important and interesting, is but one of a number of events drawing the leaders of the industry to St. Louis this week. The Society of Automotive Engineers will hold its national aeronautic meeting at the Hotel Jefferson, Feb. 18, 19 and 20. Five sessions and twelve papers devoted to aeronautic engines, fuels, instruments, production and radio will make the meeting of more than usual importance to those interested in air transportation.

Broad Scope of Topics.

Herbert Hoover Jr., radio expert for Western Air Express, will discuss radio communication and transport work. O. C. Bridgeman of the Bureau of Standards is scheduled to explain the little understood "vapor lock," to which many accidents and motor failures are attributed. He will explain its action and suggest means of eliminating it. "Vapor lock" is an interruption of gasoline flow due to the formation of bubbles or vapor in the fuel feed system.

William B. Robertson of the Curtiss-Wright Corporation and head of the Curtiss-Robertson Company of St. Louis, will discuss production methods and E. L. Nelson and F. M. Ryan of the Bell Telephone Laboratories will contribute a paper on radio communication in aircraft.

The manufacturers' section of the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce will hold a series of meetings throughout the week and close its sessions with a meeting in which the Aeronautics Branch of the Department of Commerce will join the discussion on such matters as approval certificates and modifications in the air commerce regulations.

Conferences will be held on such subjects as aeronautical education in the schools and colleges of the country. Reports will be presented by the chamber's flying school section on the effect of the present Department of Commerce regulations on flying schools.

The exhibits themselves include the latest products of more than forty airplane manufacturers, an exhibit in which early famous planes and motors are featured including the Whirlwind-powered Bellanca, Columbia, in which Clarence D. Chamberlin and Charles A. Levine flew to Germany, and the three Whirlwinds from the Fokker monoplane Josephine Ford in which the late Floyd Bennett and Admiral Byrd flew over the North Pole.

The Curtiss-Wright Corporation for the first time is exhibiting in a unified display the products of the thirteen companies in its family. Here are found planes for military use, passenger transport, mail, sport and private operation. Prominent in this exhibit is the Tanager, winner of the $100,000 award in the Daniel Guggenheim Safe Aircraft Competition. The latest Curtiss-Wright creation, the twin motored eight-blade cabin monoplane called the Kingbird, is here shown for the first time.

United Aircraft and Transport, Inc., and the various units in its wide flung organization are displaying a line of planes for all duties. At the airport adjacent to the arena a Sikorsky is putting on demonstrations while under the roof are Voughts, Boeings, Stearmans, all under the banner of United.

Last year the international show went to Chicago. It was held at a time when the first signs of the subsequent depression in the aircraft industry began to appear. As a show it was interesting and impressive yet, as one observer pointed out, the great number of "no purpose" airplanes of similar types indicated that there were to be hard times ahead for at least some of the manufacturers.

Future Location in Doubt.

Moreover, the Chicago show was disappointing in its failure to draw the public and attract great crowds. It remains to be seen what St. Louis will do. If the crowds come, and a reasonable number of sales are made, it is likely that the international exposition at St. Louis may become a permanent and annual affair. If the show is not more successful than the Chicago exposition it is possible that New York may get the international exposition next year.

Certain it is that the industry expects to confer and discuss many of the fundamental problems during the exposition week as the following program shows:

150 LUFTHANSA PILOTS TAKING REAL COURSE IN BLIND FLYING

BERLIN.

THE 150 pilots employed by the Lufthansa are at present undergoing a thorough training in "blind flying" at the special training school, which the company has installed at Staaken, Berlin's largest flying field.

The training methods employed are the same as those of the Guggenheim Foundation. The Lufthansa pilots are trained practically.

After completing the theoretical part with the help of an airplane dummy, the pilot must fly for three consecutive hours in a triangle, returning each time to the original starting point. During these hours the pilot is unable to see the ground or the horizon, and he has to depend entirely on his instruments and bearings, received from the base of operations on the ground. The teacher, who sits at the second wheel, corrects any errors and prevents accidents.

One of the instructors, Air-Captain Max Polte, who has flown more than 750,000-hour kilometers in the service of the Lufthansa, says that the results so far achieved are very satisfactory, and that by next Spring most of the Lufthansa pilots will be able to fly through any fog with the help of the instruments, providing these instruments remain reliable. He points out that all pilots have found it difficult to fly by instruments instead of by intuition, which has been developed during many years of experience long before instruments and orientation marks existed. Furthermore, they have to watch a great number of instruments at a time, read incoming reports and position messages.

Polte holds that something must be invented to facilitate the pilot's work, and he hopes that the instrument invented by Boykow will be sufficiently developed within two or three years' time. Until then, Polte demands that airplanes should be tested as to their capacity for "blind flying." All instruments should be arranged in such a manner that they can be read at a single glance. The meteorologists must find new methods. Heretofore, their work has been exhausted by informing the pilots whether the weather was clear and by warning them against a projected flight.

Today almost any flight can be undertaken—providing the landing field is visible, but the landing in a fog is still the most difficult task, as there is no instrument which registers the absolute height above the ground. Summing up the results thus far attained, Polte says:

"We hope that the day will come when people will say: 'Once there were pilots who steered airplanes with their hands.' "

"CONTACT"

By REGINALD M. CLEVELAND

FURTHER examination of the so-called Watres bill, introduced into the House at the instigation of Postmaster General Brown, has led to its wide endorsement by the aviation industry. The Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce has gone on record as supporting this measure before Congress. Should it become law it is evident that an important and far-reaching change will take place in air transportation in the United States.

In effect, the bill would unify the various classes of transportation which are now separate entities, classified respectively as mail, passenger and express transportation. By abolishing the poundage basis now prevailing under the airmail contracts, and providing in its stead for space-mileage basis, the bill gives power to the Postmaster General to contract for space in passenger-carrying aircraft, and to utilize that space for mail—not necessarily designated as airmail.

IT is not difficult to see what the practical applications of this power may lead to. A passenger transport line now feeling, in common with others of its ilk, the pinch of high costs aggravated by the necessity of flying its planes but half full, may, and doubtless will, receive from the government a space-mileage contract under which the deficiencies both of load and revenue can be made up with mail to be transported by air. Such an arrangement will doubtless be the salvation of many passenger transport operators who, at present, see no escape from the horns of their dilemma.

While the bill should lead by this means to an improved position for the operators, its greatest promise probably lies in the still broader extension of air transportation which it will make possible. Limitations will be removed from airmail lines, from air passenger lines, and from air express lines, and the functions of all three will be in a measure combined. The suspicions of the friendliness of the Postoffice Department toward aviation which have been held to be probably groundless in these columns heretofore are thus seen to be altogether without foundation.

ON Wednesday a twenty-passenger Commodore flying boat will leave Miami for the first leg of the airmail and passenger route from the United States to Santiago, Chile, which will be inaugurated as a weekly service by the New York, Rio and Buenos Aires line. The first flights will be for test purposes, but a weekly service will shortly be established over a route of about 8,000 miles. The operation calls for a seven-day schedule between Miami and Buenos Aires, bringing into closer touch with the United States the commercial centres of the east coast of South America than is now maintained between those centres and Europe.

There is much of romance in this far-flung battle of peaceful penetration. The French, already entrenched on the ground and in the air, apparently dread the speeding up of contacts of trade with the United States. They shipped recently some of the newest and fastest planes of the Latecoeur type to the east coast. The answer of the American company was to purchase six Consolidated Fleetsters and two Lockheed-Vega planes and fit them with pontoons. In tests these speedy products of American plane factories have shown 190 miles an hour so equipped, many miles in excess of the top speed of the French planes now in South America. More recently still, France has indicated that she would refuse permission for the use of her airports along the South Atlantic coast unless the privilege were to be reciprocal on the part of the American airline. Its response to date is that it does not need the French airports and that it will simply pass over French Guiana as an unnecessary point of call.

Some of the moves of the aerial chessmen have elements of humor, but the whole picture is one of business as a game on a mighty playing field and with a continent's commerce involved in the stakes.

YESTERDAY saw the opening of the International Aircraft Show at St. Louis, the "Class A" show sponsored by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce. With a multitude of interesting plane types and developments in aircraft motors, the show should indicate the drift of the industry during the coming months. Much of importance may also be expected from the meetings of the various engineering societies which will take place during the week of the show. Of airplane manufacturers in this country 91 per cent are members of the chamber, and for this reason both their exposition at St. Louis and their later show to be held in New York may be considered true indices of the trend of the industry.

AIRLINE OPERATORS HAIL NEW RATE BILL FEATURES

See in Provisions of Measure Urged by Postmaster General Promise of Stability and Profit Alike for Mail And Passenger Carrying Services

By LEO A. KIERAN.

THE greatest step in the advancement of air transport since the original airmail act of Feb. 2, 1925, is seen by major airline operators in the proposed adoption of the new airmail set-up outlined in the Watres bill now pending before the House of Representatives. The outstanding feature of the new bill is the aim to build up full aerial cargoes with the end in view of placing the air transport industry on a sound basis and assuring the greater portion of the population of the United States a better mail system than is now possible under the present expensive contract scheme. Under the present régime, with contracts over main arteries, all adjoining lines are but feeders and their operations are deemed the greatest item of the deficit in airmail accounts.

The operators point out that under the terms of the new bill that deficit will be taken from the field in which the airmail serves but a small portion of the total population, namely, a narrow strip along the transcontinental trunk line, and be distributed through the nation. Despite the fact that many of the larger operators will forfeit a great part of their revenues over some of the lines, they stand behind the new bill almost to a man. The reasons for this stand are said to be in the constructive efforts of their own to build throughout the country a system of transportation which will speed up industry and travel, and place the airlines of this country far in advance of other systems the world over.

Under present regulations it is practically impossible for operators to carry anything but mail in the course of fulfilling their government contracts. With the power given to the Postmaster General under the new bill to encourage universal cargoes and passenger traffic by placing the airplane, as a common carrier, on a par with the railroads and steamship lines, the first indications are seen of the time not so far in the future when all first-class mails will be carried by air wherever possible.

The new bill was introduced in Congress by Representative Laurence H. Watres of Pennsylvania. It is based on nearly a full year of research on the part of Postmaster General Brown, himself a transportation expert of long experience, with the cooperation of the aviation industry and its leaders. The effort has been to arrive at some arrangement agreeable to present contractors and fair to others whose plans for expansion have been precluded from development by lack of appropriations and the deficit shown on present lines.

Loads to Offset Rate Cut.

Under the Watres bill the Postmaster General will receive power and discretion to sponsor the organization of lines and to let contracts for mail space in any existing ones which are economically sound and of value to communities. He will also get the power to fix rates up to $1.25 a mile for loads of 2,000 pounds. This rate is low in comparison to some of the poundage rates now in vogue, but, with more diversified cargoes, the airline operators have assured the Postoffice Department that such rates will be adequate.

A glance at the present picture and that promised under the new bill reveals the following figures. A pound of airmail posted in Boston under the present system costs the government $8.48 before it is finally delivered in Los Angeles. This amount of mailable matter costs the sender but $2.50, and that sum is all the return which the government receives, while it has to cover not only the $8.48 in contractor's fees but the regular office handling cost in cities as well. Under the new system the same amount of mail will go from Boston to Los Angeles, or any other point equidistant from its starting point, at but a fraction of the present cost.

More Passenger Lines Predicted.

Passenger airlines will increase by leaps and bounds under the new bill, according to forecasts. As compared with other forms of carrier, the airplane has many advantages, but producing revenue is not among them, according to the now experienced operators. This is partly due, they say, to lack of extensions and the abrupt termination of lines. It is pointed out that an air passenger can go from one town to the next here and there, but that on his arrival at the end of one line no other can be found. So he is forced to abandon his aerial journey for railroads or buses.

The Watres bill would place the airline in a similar position to the railroad as a mail carrier, with its change of unit cost from the pound-trip rate to one of space-mileage. A brief résumé of the bill shows:

That any mailable matter may be shipped by air. That contracts may be awarded at the discretion of the Postmaster General at strategic points. That contracts may be canceled in the same discretion. That no rate shall be in excess of $1.25 for 2,000 pounds of mail over a mile. That consolidations and foreign contracts be included in the scope of the power vested in the director.

ZRS-4 TO NEST FIVE AIRPLANES; WATER RECOVERY AIDS BALANCE

AMONG the innovations incorporated in the construction details of the new ZRS-4, the first of two new 6,500,000 cubic feet dirigibles for the navy now evolving about the first golden rivet driven a few months ago in the huge hangar of the Goodyear-Zeppelin Company at Akron, are facilities for storing five fully rigged military airplanes with a launching trapeze for them, and an extensive water recovering plant which will operate on the exhaust gases from the eight heavy duty engines.

Recent tests and exhibitions have shown the practicality of seizing or launching airplanes in full flight from dirigibles, and outlines of the value of such procedure, by naval authorities, maintain that such practice will enable dirigibles to act as airplane bases far from centres of supply, which, when added to the other advantages of the airship, will make the dirigible one of the most valuable means of aerial attack or defense of the navy.

The airplanes will be flown to the trapeze where they will be caught by hooks on the upper wings and then hauled into the hull of the ZRS-4 through a T-shaped opening. The storage room in the hull is to be seventy-five long and sixty feet wide, and the doors covering the opening have been designed to collapse in a novel manner.

Gas Space Increased.

The water condenser, acting on the exhaust gases, will take the water vapor formed by the oxygen of the air used in combustion through a system of connected tubes exposed to the airstream. This theory has always been known but has been avoided in former dirigibles because of the great parasitic resistance of the tubes. The Los Angeles has used it despite the resistance. The Goodyear engineers, however, have simplified the problem by running the tubes in the form of corrugated plates along the hull sides and using a system of heat exchangers or precoolers to dispense about 80 per cent of the initial heat.

The water separators will be at the bottom of the condensers along the side gangways of the hull and more water can thus be produced in flight than the weight of the fuel burned, so that the craft can be kept in constant balance. This practice will allow the new ship to carry more lift gas by virtue of the decreased storage space required for liquid fuel.

ASKS WATER BASE FOR COMMUTATION

Pilot Points Out Advantages Which Could Be Enjoyed by Business Men if They Could Reach City Easily in Their Air Yachts

By RODNEY H. JACKSON.

AT least one New Yorker is commuting by air this Winter between his suburban home and his city office. General Howard S. Borden of Rumson, N. J., is the owner of an amphibian air yacht which he uses regularly in traveling to and from the city. Leaving the Shrewsbury River in front of his home at 8:30 in the morning, General Borden is landed gently at the Newark Airport twenty minutes later, where his chauffeur is waiting to drive him the rest of his way to his office in downtown Manhattan. As this drive takes thirty minutes under normal traffic conditions, the General saves forty minutes over the train time, including traveling to and from stations, and about forty-five minutes over the time it takes his car to travel the forty-eight miles of road. On the return trip, leaving New York in the late afternoon, he sometimes takes off from the Newark Airport at dusk, letting his pilot land him at the well-lighted Red Bank Airport, only three miles from his house.

Although the saving of an hour and twenty minutes a day in traveling to and from work is not inconsiderable, General Borden himself admits that it is hardly worth the expense of maintaining a private cabin airplane. The feature of daily air commuting which appeals to him most strongly is the comfort of being able to sit in a quiet, warm cabin, free from annoying traffic snarls, unaffected by open drawbridges, out of reach of reckless drivers, winging his way toward his destination at more than 100 miles an hour. By following the shoreline of Staten Island into the upper bay his pilot keeps the plane always within gliding distance of the water.

If a small seaplane base could be established on Manhattan Island, or even within fifteen minutes of the Battery, General Borden believes that many other busy executives would follow his example and commute to work by air. Air commutation will have to prove itself a real time-saver, however, before it can expect to be widely adopted, because for a long time it will remain more expensive than travel by train or bus. While several large airport projects are being pushed to completion within a twenty-mile radius of New York City, the aviation companies have neglected the establishment of a water terminal for seaplanes and amphibians close to lower Manhattan, and until such a terminal is available suburban commuting will hardly pay in time saved.

Uptown River Base.

The huge Barren Island project in Jamaica Bay is reaching completion, and the Jersey Meadows at Secaucus, opposite Forty-second Street, are being drained and filled by New York Air Terminals, Inc., which is also spending $2,000,000 to level a hill and extend a new 200-acre airport out into old Bowery Bay. A seaplane terminal has been in operation at this North Beach development for almost a year past and has been used by regular passenger lines to Boston, Albany, Atlantic City and Saratoga Springs. Only twenty minutes from Forty-second Street by speedboat down the East River, it is very easily reached from uptown New York.

But, despite the existence of these airports, the only way left to cut the transfer time still shorter will be to establish a base along the waterfront.

The water terminal that is required needs no broad expanse of landing field, no large hangars nor expensive buildings. A ramp 300 feet long, with a frontage on the water at the pierhead line of from 100 to 150 feet, if efficiently operated would be sufficient to care for the traffic for two or three years to come, and would eventually become the model for many other similar terminals. No repairs would be made, no fueling done; no plane would even be allowed to remain on the ramp for more than five or ten minutes. Any one who has witnessed the operations aboard one of the navy's aircraft carriers, the Lexington and the Saratoga, where eighty-odd airplanes are handled on a deck 800 feet long by 80 wide, will grant that a 300 by 100 foot ramp could be made to care for as many as sixty medium-sized amphibian planes an hour.

Present-day operators, with large landing fields available for comparatively light traffic, have not yet been faced with the problems that will eventually arise from intense conservation of ground space, and might doubt that such full utilization of a small runway could be possible. With a ramp wide enough for two planes to pass (allowing their wings to extend over the sides), and with well-trained pilots kept moving on a strict schedule, however, the rate of a plane-a-minute may easily be maintained. A single ramp within five minutes of Wall Street, therefore, might be used by as many as four or five hundred commuters daily during the rush hours, in addition to being available to other visiting planes during the balance of the day.

Battery Ideal Site.

The Battery would probably be the most ideal location for such a landing base, as the only drawbacks from an operating point of view would be the rough, choppy water and the heavy river traffic. Battery Park, however, is owned by the city, and it would be entirely illogical to suppose that even a small portion of the valuable frontage on New York Harbor would ever be taken from the public to be devoted to the convenience of a few hundreds of commuters.

Along the East River there are probably a few available sites. The Loening Aeronautical Corporation has a small ramp at the foot of Thirty-first Street which is used for its amphibian planes, and the river will probably always be a welcome haven in case of a forced landing, and might possibly be made available for regular day-in-and-day-out use.

A seaplane base on the Hudson River has frequently been discussed in the past three years, and one was established temporarily at Seventy-second Street last year, but objections to the noise of the planes by residents along Riverside Drive necessitated its removal. A runway at the end of one of the piers south of Canal Street would serve lower Manhattan splendidly, and the width of the river at this point would give enough room to manoeuvre planes, compensating for the heavy traffic and the rough air. The objections to this location are the tremendous value of the waterfront and the unwillingness of the War Department to allow a ramp to extend beyond the pierhead line.

If a ramp could be placed along the Hudson, or on the eastern side of Newark Bay, within a mile or even two miles of the Journal Square Station in Jersey City, passengers could reach offices in lower Manhattan by taxi and Hudson tube in fifteen minutes. While not as satisfactory as a site in New York proper, such a base would prove its worth if it saved only fifteen minutes, or half the time ordinarily required to reach the Newark airport.

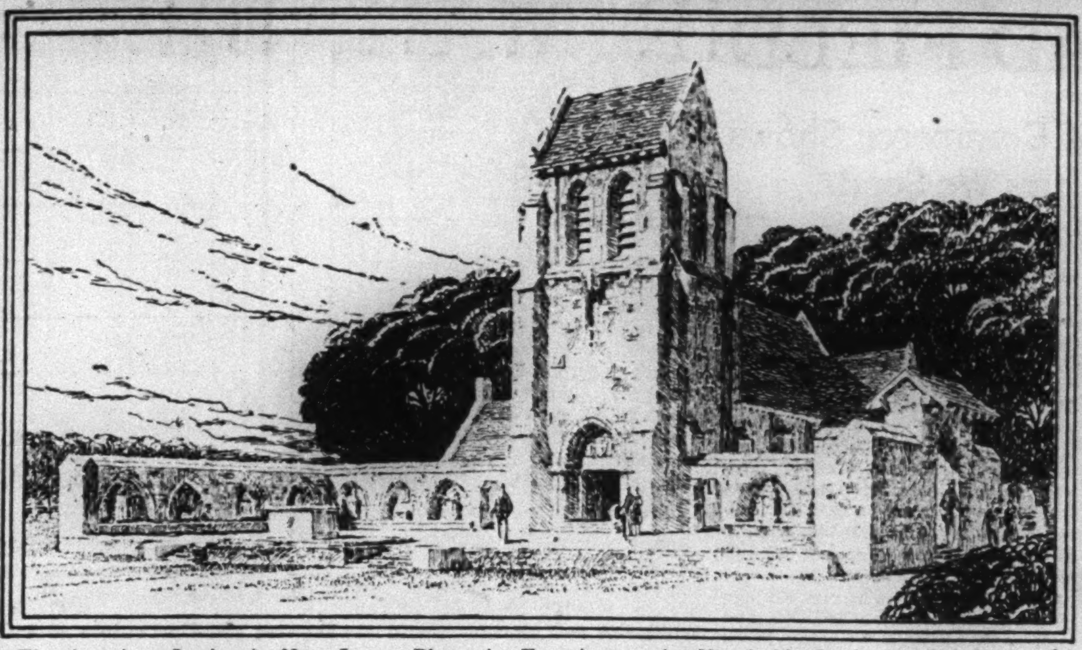
A successful airplane commuting service waits only for such a base. Today by train it takes a full hour to reach Wall Street from Greenwich or Oyster Bay, an hour and twenty minutes from Rumson, N. J., and three hours from Southampton. Busy executives would welcome a service which would cut these times in half, easily done by airplanes, provided only with suitable terminals. Owners of express cruisers would soon learn that a six-passenger amphibian could bring them to work every morning more comfortably, in greater safety and half the time they now spend on the water. And airplanes of that type cost no more to operate than the fast boats which are becoming more and more popular.

The cost of maintaining a regular commuters' service will be surprisingly low to those who have had occasion to charter airplanes for special trips.

County Mapped From Air.

A COMPLETE survey was made recently by an airplane in Jennings County, Ind. Photographs were made from a height of 13,000 feet. The photographs gave all the data necessary for a base map showing the limits of good soil areas and the effects of erosion in other areas.

ELEVATION OF PROPOSED CATHEDRAL OF AIR



The American Legion in New Jersey Plans the Erection at the Naval Air Station at Lakehurst of This Memorial Chapel to Aviators Who Have Lost Their Lives in Service.

CATHEDRAL OF THE AIR PLANS INCLUDE RELICS OF LOST CRAFT

Chapel to Be Built at Lakehurst by American Legion Will Have Naves for Several Creeds

A CHAPEL dedicated to the nation's fliers who have died in battle or in the development of commercial air transportation is to be built on the smooth-topped knoll that lies north of the great hangar housing the dirigible Los Angeles at the naval air station at Lakehurst.

It will be called the Cathedral of the Air and will be the first edifice of its kind—a house of worship serving as a memorial to brave men who have made their last flight. A good part of it will be built with relics taken from ships in which the fliers plunged to earth from the trackless lanes of the sky.

The government has approved the site, the plans and sketches have been accepted by the Navy Department, and Congress has provided for the maintenance and care in perpetuity of the edifice. Workers for the American Legion, Department of New Jersey, are raising the $175,000 to pay the cost of construction.

Paul Philippe Cret of Philadelphia, who designed many war memorials in France and in the United States, has drawn the plans for the Cathedral of the Air. The structure will be of modified Gothic type on a ground plan resembling a monoplane's general outline. From the air the chapel will look like a huge earth-bound plane.

Within the chapel will be several naves, each for a different creed. The main part of the chapel will have seats for perhaps 200 persons. In the wings the facilities will be less generous, but will be designed to meet the needs of the worshipers. One nave will be dedicated to the men who died in the dirigible Shenandoah's crash into the Ohio Valley several years ago. In this nave the pulpit will be made of parts of the dirigible's gondolas, and the rafters above the pulpit will be fashioned out of duralumin taken from the framework of the Shenandoah.

If, as is expected, the money for the project is raised this month, building may start in May and the chapel may be opened in the Fall with Commander Edel, navy chaplain at Lakehurst, in charge.

One section of the chapel, probably the tower, will be dedicated to American airmen who died in battle during the World War while serving with the Lafayette Escadrille or with American units. Another section will be a memorial to such men as Floyd Bennett, Commander Zachary Lansdowne and the Wright brothers. This feature is not complete, the final selection being still in the hands of the memorial committee.

The plan for the Cathedral of the Air was originated by Gill Robb of Trenton.

NOTES FROM WIDE FIELD OF AVIATION

THE Private Flying Club Committee of the National Aeronautic Association has announced that it is now in a position to furnish private clubs with student crash insurance covering dual and solo students and operators who have procured their private and limited commercial licenses. Members of the committee have been agitating to provide this necessity for some time, as lack of insurance provision has heretofore hampered the organization of private clubs.

THE CURTISS-WRIGHT CORPORATION has announced a new set of municipality maps covering areas of 300 square miles around each city in which its airports division has a landing field. The first of the maps is of St. Louis and forty-one others will be printed shortly. The maps show all airways, beacons and the principal towns en route to the airport within a radius of twenty-five to thirty miles. Below the maps are keys with detailed descriptions of lakes, water towers, railroads and other guides to navigation.

PACIFIC COAST people write more air mail letters than Easterners, according to a check of poundage carried by the Boeing System on its Chicago-San Francisco division of the transcontinental. In a recent month it carried 2,888,000 letters westbound and 3,160,000 eastbound. On the Seattle-Los Angeles route more mail is sent north than south, due to night service which permits letters leaving Los Angeles at midnight to reach San Francisco at 3:30 A. M., while southbound service from San Francisco is in the afternoon.

UPON the initiative of General Dubra, Minister of War of Uruguay, the government of that country is preparing to hold a Pan-American aviation congress in connection with the celebration this year of the centenary of the organization of the republic as an independent nation. Invitations are to be sent to all the nations of South, Central and North America.

OUR NATIONAL EXPORTS COVER A BROAD FIELD

The Latest Report of the Department of Commerce Shows The Great Variety of the Commodities We Send Into the Markets of the World

A REPORT just made public by the Department of Commerce gives a picture of the variety of articles and wares exported by the United States to practically every country in the world.

Without delving into specific items in this large list of exported articles, the American merchant can scan the balance sheet of exports and imports, and suffer no qualm, for the trade balance for 1929 is in our favor to the extent of $841,136,276. The amount of exports reached the enormous figure of $5,241,262,276, and our imports during the same period a total of $4,400,126,000.

The ten leaders in our export trade and the value of these shipments are as follows:

1. Cotton unmanufactured	$770,830,000
2. Automobiles and vehicles	588,023,000
3. Petroleum and products	561,178,000
4. Grains and preparations	286,354,000
5. Industrial machinery	277,754,000
6. Non-ferrous metal—except precious	238,773,000
7. Tobacco and tobacco manufactures	165,625,000
8. Agricultural machinery	140,801,000
9. Fruits and nuts	137,467,000
10. Electrical machinery	121,365,000

The total value for the leading ten items or classifications indicates that more than three-fifths of the total of our exports is to be found in comparatively few commodities.

Following close on the heels of electrical machinery, last of the leading ten commodities, comes a group of important exports whose values in dollars and cents are close together. Animal oils and edible fats reached a total of $117,714,000; wood manufactures and sawmill products, $110,628,000; coal and related products, $106,151,000; iron and steel manufactures, $104,148,000; steel mill products (manufactures), $96,046,000; iron and steel advanced manufactures, $87,003,000.

The ten leading imports are:

1. Silk, unmanufactured	$432,340,000
2. Cocoa, coffee and tea	379,534,000
3. Non-ferrous metals—except precious	307,681,000
4. Rubber and manufactures	247,421,000
5. Sugar and related products	229,663,000
6. Paper and manufactures	163,184,000
7. Petroleum and products	143,545,000
8. Hides and skins, raw, except furs	137,281,000
9. Furs and manufactures	122,529,000
10. Paper base stocks	118,133,000

Other important items on the import list include jute and manufactures, $95,989,000; vegetable oils, inedible, $91,819,000; fruits and nuts, $86,648,000; oil seeds $79,335,000; cotton manufactures, $63,454,000; wool, unmanufactured, $87,344,000; fertilizer and fertilizer materials, $72,340,000. The imports of precious stones, pearls and imitations reached a total of $79,650,000. Works of art brought into the country reach the value of $82,106,000.

While the staples of American export are chiefly responsible for building up the huge total, many sidelights are cast by the Government report on the variety of products that we send out of the country. Some of the items hold surprises.

Although the United States must import all of its crude rubber, the list of exports includes rubber erasers to the value of $368,086. American manufacturers exported windmills to the value of $1,786,607. We exported fly paper, fly traps, fly swatters, insecticides, exterminators, &c., to the amount of $3,351,606. Foreign countries want our oyster shells and are willing to pay for them. More than 42,000 tons were exported during the last year.

Pork Goes to Cuba.

Cuba took more than 10,000,000 pounds of pork which was about the same amount as that taken by Continental Europe and the United Kingdom combined. Cuba is our best customer for dairy products, taking almost half of our total export. Of sardines we ship millions of pounds. Our best customers for sardines are British Malaya, the Dutch East Indies and the Philippine Islands. Siam takes more than 2,500,000 pounds annually.

Our export of false teeth totaled more than 25,000,000 and brought in a revenue of $1,267,953. We exported bulls for breeding purposes to the number of 2,196, and 1,376 cows. We also exported 7,589 horses. The total value of these live stock exportations was in excess of $1,500,000.

Toy balloons accounted for $880,235 in our export total, and rubber bathing caps for $389,316. We exported $378,362 worth of wheelbarrows and $220,000 of pushcarts. We shipped $7,860,837 worth of phonographs and $4,335,731 worth of records.

American devices for the equipment of amusement parks abroad had a value of $579,990. Playing cards of American make were exported to the amount of $705,881 and billiard tables and accessories found outside markets for a total of nearly $400,000. American bathtubs to the value of $763,717 found foreign buyers. Other items were garters and arm bands valued at $761,620; beekeeping equipment, at $129,992; soda fountain equipment at $618,749, souvenir post cards at $251,796, needles at $908,664, cosmetics at $812,233 and shoe polishes at $808,449.

Other peoples bought our slippers to the extent of nearly $500,000, and undressed feathers weighing more than 10,000,000 pounds. In our large export of fruits, the apple is chief. The value of apples exported exceeded $20,000,000. The chewing gum shipments abroad amounted to nearly 4,000,000 pounds. Field and garden seed exports were more than 26,000,000 pounds. Hair weighing more than 20,000,000 pounds found markets outside America and netted more than $2,000,000.

The articles of electrical machinery for export are too many to enumerate. But foreign sales of radio receiving sets amounted to about $10,000,000, and receiving set components to almost half that amount. Therapeutic apparatus, X-ray machines, galvanic and faradic batteries, &c., brought nearly $2,000,000, while storage batteries accounted for about $3,500,000.

Oil Well Machinery.

In the machinery and vehicles group the item of nearly $25,000,000 for oil well drilling apparatus and other oil well and oil refinery machinery, indicates that America is far in the lead of other nations in this field. Sewing machines bring in $10,000,000 annually, our neighbor Mexico being our best customer after the United Kingdom. Nearly $10,000,000 worth of cash registers found their way to foreign countries.

The greatest increase registered over 1928 was in aircraft, for in 1929 the value of aircraft exported was more than treble the amount of the preceding year and was almost $6,000,000 in value.

Dynamite led in the field of explosives, with an export of more than 16,000,000 pounds of a value in excess of $2,000,000. Foreign countries contributed nearly $3,000,000 for paintings and statuary.

Turning to imports we find that the principal item in our large raw fur bill is made up of more than $19,000,000 for coney and rabbit, about the same amount for lamb, kid, sheep and goat, $16,000,000 for foxes other than silver and black. Of ermine we import about $2,250,000 worth annually. Dog and goat skins dyed and dressed reach a total in excess of $7,000,000.

Brazil does the big coffee business, having sent to America $178,355,723 worth last year. Colombia runs a poor second with $78,810,950. Java is woefully outdistanced, sending us a paltry $4,933,679 worth. From the Philippine Islands alone we buy nearly $30,000,000 worth of cocoanut oil, and from the same country obtain nearly all of our copra valued in excess of $13,000,000.

Our Liquor Imports Small.

Recorded imports of distilled liquors and wines look very small. "Dry" America, however, brought in through regular channels foreign distillations and vintages valued at $500,000.

Our importations of tobacco in all forms come to about $60,000,000, which leaves us a favorable balance on tobacco of something more than $100,000,000. Most of our jute comes from British India and has a value in excess of $60,000,000. The Philippines supply most of our high-grade hemp.

Our raw silk comes mostly from Japan, that country selling us $356,000,000 annually, with China a poor second with $61,000,000. Italy is an outdistanced third with something more than $7,000,000. France furnishes a scant $1,000,000 worth of the raw material.

Holland and Belgium supply most of our cut but unset diamonds, and the annual total from these two small countries exceeds $35,000,000 in value. France is first in pearls, her exports to us exceeding $5,000,000.

In the matter of distribution of our exports we find that Europe receives $2,340,703,591; North America, $1,395,232,521; South America, $539,343,715; Asia, $643,420,787; Oceania, $192,022,974, and Africa, $130,538,688.

HENPECKED LIVERPOOL HUSBANDS FIND MUTUAL SOLACE IN A UNION

IT has just been made known that a union for henpecked husbands has been in existence for some time in the city of Liverpool, England. More than 400 men have declared their allegiance to this little army of discontented mortals, including men in all walks of society.

One of the purposes of the organization is said to be the punishment of nagging wives, but nothing has transpired as to the character of the penalties imposed upon the women, nor as to whether any punishment has as yet been inflicted, whether nagging ceased as a result or whether members cease their membership of the Henpecked Husbands' Union after their domestic difficulties have been adjusted.

It is one of the conditions of membership of the union that husbands must prove beyond all doubt that they are suffering from the effects of their spouses' uncongenial attitude. It might be imagined that a man's unqualified statement would be sufficient and instantly entitle him to the relief, if any, afforded by the union. But the directorate requires corroborating evidence and, seeing that the club already rejoices in 400 downtrodden mortals, the necessary testimony must have been forthcoming.

Vienna, the Austrian capital, has an association for the protection of man from female aggression, but this is rather economic in its objects. Up to the present time no marked success has fallen to its efforts, and it is difficult to predict what is going to be the fate of the Henpeckers' Union. What will happen to some of its individual members may be surmised.

THE BARBER'S POSITION RISES —HE IS A CHIROTONSOR NOW

Sometimes He Takes a Smart Vacation, and He Has Greatly Improved His Selling Talk

THE historian Gibbon relates that the Emperor Julian once entered the palace at Constantinople and asked for a barber. A man appeared, so magnificently attired that the Emperor exclaimed, "It is a barber that I want, not a Receiver General of the Finances!"

While the barber of today will perhaps never be mistaken for a high government official, he is nevertheless coming up in the world. In the first place, he now has a high-sounding name for his calling. He is a chirotonsor, just as real estate agents, undertakers and press agents are realtors, morticians and public relations counsels. In these days he sometimes accompanies a customer to Florida or Europe for a free and pleasant vacation.

A stir was caused last Fall when Louis Arico, barber for some of Tammany's bigwigs, was summoned to Paris by William F. Kenney—not to cut hair, the dispatches relate, but for a vacation. Then other stories were dug up, telling of barbers who had received vacations in Florida or in the West. Now comes Joe Perricone, Stock Exchange barber, who is to have a two-weeks sojourn in Florida through the generosity of the Exchange vice president because never in three years has he tried to sell Mr. Whitney a hair tonic.

This seems a remarkable record, for the barber of New York is a high-powered and subtle salesman. His methods do not give the customer who has come in merely for a shave or haircut a chance to say "No" at once and end the selling efforts. For the barber's questions—like the famous one, "Have you stopped beating your wife yet?"—do not permit of a categorical "No," or even "Yes."

To the man whose hair is getting a little thin he will slyly ask, "Are you doing anything about this?" The victim dare not say "No," for it would lay him open to all sorts of suggestions for treatments. And if he says "Yes" it is quite evident that whatever treatment he is taking is a failure, and the barber, in a most subtle way, can indicate that there is little hope of saving the last few hairs—unless a new treatment is used. "What are you doing about this?" also is a hard one to answer. Then the suggestion, "It's getting a little thin," opens a path for a discussion as to what to do about it. The barber is always ready with his suggestion of a shampoo, singeing, tonic, &c.

The technique of New York barbers improves each year. Time was, for instance, when the hair-cutter would actually use his own energy to rub the customer's head. Now he puts his fingers in a vibrating machine, and applies them to the waiting head. The machine moves them. It is much simpler. A good deal of his work is done by electricity.

Even the matter of wrapping the neck, to keep the cut hair from falling down the victim's collar—to his great annoyance—has changed, and today there are almost as many ways of accomplishing this simple feat as there are barber shops. There is the little rubber collar, which fits neatly around the neck and which hooks up. There is the strip of linen gauze, such as surgeons use, wrapped around and around as though the customer were seriously wounded near the jugular. Instead of covering the shoulders with a cloth or towel, some barbers make the victim put his arms into a white garment, resembling a nightgown or a shroud.

In the efficient barber shops of New York the customer no sooner enters than he is made to feel the guest of honor at a banquet. A flunkey takes his hat and coat, he is ushered to a seat, a bootblack offers to shine his shoes, and a girl in a white gown offers to manicure his nails.

NEW LINK TO MOUNT VERNON

Memorial Road From Capital to Replace Old Railway

THE little railway that has served pilgrims to Washington's home and tomb, Mount Vernon on the Potomac, for thirty-seven years is soon to disappear. The tracks are to be torn up and the roadbed is to be incorporated in part in the new George Washington Memorial Boulevard, extending from the capital to the historic estate. The government expects to have the boulevard completed for the celebration of the 200th anniversary of Washington's birth, in 1932.

For some time the fate of the little electric railway from Alexandria, Va., to the mansion's gate, has been foreseen, for tourists seemed to prefer the sight-seeing buses, or else they have depended on their own cars. The railway, in consequence, has suffered for want of patrons.

The steamboat trip, too, once the most popular mode of visiting Mount Vernon, is less favored than formerly. The leisurely trip down the Potomac is too slow to fit into the rushed program of the ordinary traveler of today. By automobile the round trip visit to Mount Vernon, fifteen miles below Washington, is but half a day's expedition from the capital; or else it is no more than a roadside stop on the way further south, lying as it does but two miles by good road from the main artery of travel.

Early Difficulties of Travel.

The facility with which visitors now reach the first President's country home is in marked contrast with the journey in Washington's day. Though Mount Vernon had its dock to which ships came with articles imported from abroad, or to fetch away grain and flour, its master and his guests depended rather on the road, even as visitors do now. But what different roads they were then, and what different vehicles! One visitor, J. U. Niemewicz, the Polish poet, setting out in a family coach from Georgetown, put down the account of his journey thither in his diary:

"We crossed the river on a ferryboat and followed the Maryland bank. The Federal city (or rather the grounds destined to be the city) is seen therefrom in the guise of an amphitheatre. After having traveled about four or five miles we arrived at the point opposite to Alexandria. We spent twenty-five minutes in recrossing the Potomac. We followed the way through a country intersected by heights and covered with forests. After having gone over seven miles we arrived at the foot of a hill where General Washington's possessions begin. We entered a way newly hewn through an oak forest and soon discovered another hill, on whose top a spacious white mansion was situated, crowned with a little cupola, with attic and blinds painted in green."

The tediousness of the journey, however, was not enough to deter people of the eighteenth century, judging from the throngs of guests who availed themselves of the Washingtons' hospitality. Dinner for the family without guests was a rare event during Washington's retirement. In after years, however, Mount Vernon was less frequented. Refused by the government, to which it had been offered at bargain rates, the estate experienced a period of decay and neglect, awaiting a buyer, until Miss Ann Pamela Cunningham of South Carolina determined to arouse the women of the nation to buy and preserve it. The Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, organized in 1853, within seven years obtained the necessary $200,000 and so became the owners of Washington's home.

A Mecca for Pilgrims.

With the purpose of establishing the home as a national shrine, the new owners lost no time in putting it into sufficient order to receive visitors. The walls were patched with plastering, painting and papering were done, and the grounds were made more presentable. A small steamboat, the Thomas Collyer, was leased on the basis of a share of her earnings in return for wharf privileges, and the estate was opened to the public at an admission fee of 25 cents. Soon Mount Vernon proved such a mecca for sightseers that it became evident the association's patriotic move would also prove a good investment.

The outbreak of the Civil War brought confiscation of the boat that carried most of the visitors. Again the mansion was deserted, except by its caretaker and an occasional straggler, who usually did not tarry long. After the war Miss Cunningham herself moved into the house and put the association again in working order, with the result that by 1875 it was ready to undertake the task of restoring the mansion and grounds according to the original plans.

The 1880s saw an annual pilgrimage of some 3,000 paying visitors to Mount Vernon. Since then the numbers have steadily increased until they were counted in hundreds of thousands annually. In 1917 more than 100,000 came by land and almost 50,000 by boat. The war years failed to deter the pilgrims; people continued to come in ever increasing numbers. In 1920 the 200,000 mark was in sight, and in the last five years there has been a steady increase. Last year the shrine had more than 500,000 visitors.

These hosts of visitors at 25 cents each, together with numerous gifts from all sorts of people in all parts of the country, have made the Mount Vernon Ladies Association one of the most prosperous organizations of its kind. It was originally proposed to discontinue the admission fee when the endowment had reached $100,000, but the time for that step has been postponed as the conception of the proper upkeep of the place has grown. The visitor who now pays for the privilege of visiting Washington's home has the gratification of beholding the estate restored with fidelity to detail and with priceless treasures and relics of the Washington family preserved there.

The low price of the new De Soto Straight Eight is indeed sensational, but an equally great sensation is De Soto Eight's extraordinary excellence. The price does not begin to index the quality and ability of this fine car. On inspection you find that it possesses an unusual number of distinctive quality features—and Chrysler Motors engineers have given it a performance ability not surpassed by Eights costing hundreds of dollars more. The superiority of the new De Soto Straight Eight is so plain and unmistakable that all authorities agree in predicting for it a success equally as great as that attained by its famous companion car—the record-breaking De Soto Six.

NOW THE "DIAMOND" ROOKIE VISITS THE SPRING CAMP

At Training Centres in the South, He Is Trying to Take the Place of the Veteran, but Though Many of His Kind Are Called, Not All of Them Are Chosen

By IRVING G. GUTTERMAN.

ONCE again ballplayers from all parts of the country are packing their bags and starting their annual trek to the Southland. Scattered throughout the Southern States are the encampments of the major league ball clubs where the players are to prepare themselves for the 1930 baseball season.

For one month of the year the training camp is astir with prancing athletes limbering up and testing their batting eye, pouncing upon elusive grounders and working the kinks out of rusty arms. The season is critical, for in it coaches and managers keep on the lookout for fading veterans and budding prospects.

Of all the players who assemble, none commands so much attention as the rookie. The perfect ball club, in order to keep up a lively pace throughout the whole season, must have young blood to supply the necessary vitality, and it is from the green youngsters that the selection is made.

The rookie spends his days at the training camp practicing regularly and learning from the veteran on the side. He listens to old-timers who discourse upon various phases of the game not connected with minor league ball. The situation is tinged with a bit of irony in that the veterans chat with youngsters who are endeavoring to take their places—the veterans are actually helping to push themselves out of the picture. When Lou Gehrig first reported to the Yankees as a substitute first baseman, Wally Pipp, who at that time was holding down the job, taught him various fielding pointers. Within a year the veteran of many campaigns was retired from the club and Gehrig was in his position.

After the training season gets under way, teams are formed to practice against each other, and sometimes the contests lead to pathos. John McGraw, veteran manager of the New York Giants, tells of an incident that moved him deeply.

"I was sitting in the hot sun with Davie Bancroft and watching young Travis Jackson working out with the regulars a week after he had reported for duty," said McGraw. "I turned to my former shortstop and remarked that Jackson was a youngster who would undoubtedly make good. Bancroft didn't answer me, and when I looked at him I noticed that there were tears in his eyes. It was just another one of those inevitable tragedies of baseball — the passing of the veteran and the coming of the youthful rookie."

Types of Rookies.

There are two types of rookies that come in to take a try at breaking into the "big show." One is serious, nervous and careful to make an impression. He has striven to build a reputation to commend him to a big league manager. He has dreamed of popularity, fame and a comfortable life. At last he has managed to arrive at a training camp and his actions and skill will determine his ability to stick with the club.

The other is known as the fresh kid, who endeavors to establish himself by an easy disregard of the superiority of the veteran ballplayers. He talks unceasingly of his great feats in the minor circuits as though he were positive of his position, and frequently breaks out into eloquent bombast on the plight of the team, offering remedies.

A delight to the veterans, he is frequently sent for the "key to the pitcher's box" and is the butt of many practical jokes. They call him "busher" or "hickey" and tell him to go back to the "sticks" or "ham and egg league."

The most famous rookie of this type came up with the White Sox last year. He became known as "The Great Shires" because of his high estimation of his own abilities. On the trip north he was appointed captain of the team, and every time a reporter showed up at the field Shires would remark, "You can tell your readers what this league needs is more hitting, and I'm the one to see that they get it." The funny part of it was that Shires would go out and garner two or three hits a day.

The question as to how new prospects are discovered has often been asked. Rookies are acquired in three ways. There is the scouting system, which entails a lot of work on the part of the managers; the "farm" or "chair store" system, stressed more in the past few years, and the offering of services on the part of the young players themselves.

The scouting system is the most common method of acquiring new ball players. Scouts who are baseball-wise are sent out by clubs to scour the country for players. They tour the minors, stopping off at various towns to take in the ball game. If they are impressed by the skilled actions of a player in batting, pitching or fielding, they remain for a few days to be sure he is consistent. If the scout thinks the player is good enough for a major league tryout, he signs him to report at once or to be on hand at the Spring training camp. He keeps in constant communication with the main office and must obtain consent before he acts.

Jimmy Reese, Who Reports to the New York Yankees.

Under the "chain-store" system a major league club takes one or more minor league clubs under its wing and thus obtains first call on the services of any player developed on the secondary team. The St. Louis Cardinals have several teams, including Rochester of the International League and Houston of the Texas League, from which they have drawn players. However, the plan has not been successful for Branch Rickey, its main supporter, and it did not improve the Cardinals' standing in the 1929 pennant race as compared with their showing in the last eight years. Several league officials have argued against the plan at the league meetings and many controversies have arisen because of it. But it is still being practiced and in some cases has been successful. As a "farm" the secondary club is useful in developing inexperienced players.

Many ball players come to managers and ask for a tryout. Most of them are turned down because of the expense entailed, but some get a chance if they bring convincing references. Eddie Collins and Waite Hoyt, both famous ball players, once offered their services to McGraw, but they were turned down without a trial. Lloyd Waner asked for a position with an American League ball team, but did not get a trial. He applied for a position with a Class A outfit in the minors and was again rejected. Nevertheless, on his brother Paul's reference, he got an opportunity to work out with Pittsburgh, and within a year stood out as one of the leading outfielders.

Frequently headlines announce that a new "sensation" has been picked up on the West Coast. The scout who discovered the lad presents his record, and the followers of the team for which he has been acquired are joyously firm in the opinion that the newcomer will cinch the pennant. Two weeks after the season opens the expensive rookie is seated in the dugout watching the ball game. Another week goes by and he is back in the minors.

A high-priced tag on a recruit means nothing. Connie Mack has tried about 500 rookies in his baseball career and has experienced many disappointments. In 1923 he bought Paul Strand, who was hailed as a marvelous batsman, having clouted .390 with Salt Lake City in nearly 200 contests. Strand reported in the Spring of 1924 and it took Mack four weeks to find out that he would not do. A trade resulted and the $75,000 sensation found himself with Toledo. Luckily Al Simmons appeared on the scene for a fraction of what Strand cost, and he developed into one of Mack's greatest and hardest hitting outfielders.

This year there will be a horde of managers, scouts, club owners, newspaper men and veteran ball players in the training camps eyeing the rookies, who will include a group from the Pacific Coast. Most of the minor leaguers from Maine to California will be represented. One of the outstanding ball players who will report is Jimmy Reese, fresh from a brilliant career with the San Francisco Seals. Reese comes to the Yankee training camp as half of a $125,000 transaction. Some of the candidates have been up before. Some have an enormous amount of money attached to their names. Some will be old veterans trying to get back into the "big show," and some will be failures of other years. Not even half of those who report make good. They are forced to go back to start anew—if they are young enough.

THE SOUTH DRAWING MOTORISTS OUT OF THE NORTH

VARIOUS ROUTES LEAD TO OLD NEW ORLEANS

Motorists Planning Southern Trip to Include Mardi Gras Have Choice of Ways—Roads Reported in Generally Good Condition—Other Highway News

By LEON A. DICKINSON.

ON a Tuesday before Ash Wednesday more than a hundred years ago a procession of grotesquely clad masqueraders appeared upon the narrow, twisting streets of New Orleans. It was a band of exuberant students recently returned from Paris. From that impromptu beginning has evolved the Mardi Gras of today—a brilliant, effervescent pageant which each year attracts tourists from all over the world.

The season this year was formally opened by the Twelfth Night Revellers on Jan. 6. The climax will come with the beginning of the public events on the Thursday preceding Mardi Gras, that is, Feb. 27. The first of these is the parade and ball of Momus, followed on March 1 by the ball of the Mystic Club. Then, on the evening of March 3, comes the torch parade of Proteus, and finally, on March 4, Mardi Gras itself—Fat Tuesday—ending the season on a gay and spectacular note.

For Northerners who plan to motor down for the festivities a number of good routes are available. Road conditions are reported generally fine throughout.

One of the most direct routes out of New York City and vicinity is U. S. Route 11, reached by driving through Easton and Reading to Harrisburg, Pa. If desired, this route may be followed all the way to New Orleans. It offers uninterrupted pavement as far as the Alabama State line, a few miles southwest of Chattanooga. This first long stretch of modern highway passes through the picturesque Shenandoah Valley in Western Virginia to Roanoke, then continues in a southwesterly direction to Bristol, at the boundary between Virginia and Tennessee.

Between Bristol and Knoxville two good options are available, one running via Kingsport, the other through Johnson City. Likewise, from Knoxville to Chattanooga the motorist has a choice of two highways, both of which offer good traveling surfaces.

Local Information.

At Birmingham the motorist should make inquiries as to road conditions beyond that point, as the weather may effect changes and construction is going on at several points.

While Route 11 is the most direct from Birmingham to New Orleans, those who go that way will miss the interesting drive along the Gulf of Mexico through the noted resorts of Biloxi and Gulfport.

In case this latter route is selected one should drive first to Montgomery over good pavement, and then make local inquiries about the proper route to follow between that city and Mobile. At this writing there seems to be some doubt as to which route is preferable. U. S. 31 is the more direct, but construction work between the towns of Evergreen and Brewton in Southern Alabama may make a detour advisable. The slightly longer alternate by way of Andalusia is likewise reported under construction between that place and Brewton.

Another popular way to reach New Orleans from New York is to proceed southwest along U. S. Route 1 through Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond and South Hill as far as Henderson, N. C. Here turn right for a few miles to Oxford; then southwest to Durham, and west into Greensboro. From this point the well-known highway that leads through Charlotte, Spartanburg, Greenville and Athens is followed to Atlanta. This is marked with several numbers, but the greater part of it, from North Carolina to Atlanta, is a section of U. S. Route 29. The road is largely paved, although occasional stretches of gravel and sand-clay will be found in North Carolina and Georgia.

The next section of this highway from Atlanta to Montgomery offers good pavement as far as Opelika, Ala. Then comes gravel to Tuskegee, and pavement with some good gravel into Montgomery.

An alternate to U. S. Route 1 as far as Baltimore, by-passing Trenton, Philadelphia and Wilmington, is to follow New Jersey Route 25 out of New Brunswick. At Bordentown continue south and west through Mount Holly, Moorestown, Westville, Woodbury and Pennsville, ferrying across to New Castle. From this point U. S. Route 40 may be followed into Baltimore.

Still another route is available between Greensboro, N. C., and Atlanta that offers magnificent scenery through the "Land of the Sky" surrounding the famous resort city of Asheville. This latter alternate is but very little longer that the route first mentioned through Charlotte and Greenville, and offers excellent pavement most of the way.

The distance from New York to New Orleans is approximately 1,500 miles.

Tunnel Route Advancing.

WORK on closing the gap in the new Holland Tunnel route between Jersey City and Newark will be one of the major operations of the New Jersey State Highway Commission this year.

As the greatest number of delays in that district are caused by the turning of the draw span in the Lincoln Highway Bridge over the Hackensack River, the first contract to be let early this year will be for a new bridge. Because of its importance as a link in the New Jersey highway system the new bridge will be high enough for all river craft to pass under it, with a clearance of 135 feet.

Through the construction of ramps on the Jersey City and Kearny ends, traffic will be permitted to use it as soon as it can be built. As quickly as possible, however, bids will be taken for the viaduct across the Kearny peninsula and for the new bridge over the Passaic River, which will also have a clearance of 135 feet. The State is planning to have the entire link finished in about two years.

Work now under way on the bridging of the Elizabeth River in Elizabeth for the Express Highway, Route 25, is progressing at a good pace, and this should be ready by July. Traffic is now meeting some delay in passing through Elizabeth, as a detour is required to reach the new wide road leading directly to the recently opened bridge over the Raritan River between New Brunswick and Raritan Township.

This structure will permit motorists to escape the congestion that has prevailed on the Raritan River bridge at the Albany Street approach to New Brunswick.

From Trenton South.

BUILT upon a practically straight north-south line from Trenton, N. J., to Atlantic County, the new State Highway, Route 39, will reduce the traveling distance from the capital city to points in Southern New Jersey.

It will permit the skirting of Mount Holly and Medford by passing through East Hampton and Red Lion. The last contract to be let for that part of the route from Bordentown to Atsion was the three and one-half-mile link from Chamber's Corner, near Mount Holly, to South Pemberton Road, and this is only 8 per cent done. The remainder of the road under contract will be ready for traffic about the middle of the Summer.

Route 29 Open to Traffic.

SECTIONS of the new Route 29, already completed between Hillside, N. J., and Scotch Plains, are being used by traffic, but this new State highway will not be completed to Somerville before the later part of the Summer.

This artery will ultimately be preferred by cross-State traffic to Route 28, with its delays in Cranford, Westfield, Plainfield and Bound Brook. For the greater part of its length it is being laid with ribbons of concrete ten feet in width. The joint marker will provide permanent traffic lanes and will leave space for the passing of slower vehicles.

Completing Route 31.

TWO contracts now under way on Route 31 will complete that State highway from Princeton, N. J., to Andover, Sussex County. A new line has been acquired from Bedminster, Somerset County, to Chester, Morris County, through Gladstone, and when it is finished it will no longer be necessary to follow the devious course in that part of Somerset County. The five-mile link between Chester and Gladstone is 16 per cent finished, and the four miles from Bedminster to Gladstone are 7 per cent complete.

Sussex County residents already have the benefit of that part of the route from Andover to Chester, which reduces their running time to Trenton and Princeton.

More "Excellent" Miles.

CONCRETE highway surface laid in Pennsylvania in 1929 and tested by the "roughometer" proved smoother, on the average, than any year's record made so far. Pavement mileage reaching the standard "excellent" in 1929 totaled 276 out of 532 miles tested, a gain in the number of "excellent" miles of 111 per cent over 1928, when 131 miles out of a tested 334 were found to be "excellent."

To be classed as "excellent" a mile of highway must record not more than twenty-five accumulated inches of roughness. This is detected by the roughometer when it is vibrated by the tiny ridges and valleys in the pavement. This vibration actuates the mechanism and a reading dial adds up the bumps in inches.

MOTORS AND MOTOR MEN

STUDEBAKER today celebrates its seventy-eighth anniversary. Started as a little frontier blacksmith shop by Henry and Clem Studebaker, the business has grown to such proportions that during the decade ended Dec. 31, 1929, its total sales amounted to $1,336,000,000, as contrasted with $560,833,172 made during the first sixty-eight years.

The Motor Truck Association of America, Inc., will hold its annual banquet on Feb. 18 at the Hotel Astor.

With the contracts signed at Chicago during the automobile show there, and those signed during show week in New York, the Austin "bantam" car will go into production this Spring at Butler, Pa., with assured dealer demand for 85,575 units, valued at about $37,000,000, it is announced by C. A. Best, general sales manager of the American Austin Car Company.

Packard has selected seven distinct forms of vehicle built to the lines of the Packard 145-inch de luxe chassis, and will have an initial exhibit of them at the Brooklyn branch of the company on Feb. 22. The combined value of these custom-built cars is said to be well over $75,000.

The automobile industry in the United States produced 5,358,361 units in 1929, of which Ford production accounted for 1,709,945 cars and trucks, according to figures compiled by the United States Chamber of Commerce. . . . Auburn sold 40 per cent more cars in January than in the same month last year, and broke all previous records in sales of cars at both the New York and Chicago national shows, R. H. Faulkner, vice president of the company, reports. . . . January shipments of Chrysler-built passenger cars, trucks, buses and commercial vehicles showed an increase of more than 50 per cent over December, and orders call for further increases in production in February, company officials state. . . . The Oakland Motor Car Company reports heavier sales at the 1930 New York and Chicago shows than were registered during the 1929 shows. . . . Shipments of La France-Republic trucks for January showed an increase of 107 per cent over those for the same month last year, according to announcement.

BROWN NOW HEADS LIST OF POPULAR CAR COLORS

FOR the first time, brown now heads the list of popular colors for automobiles, according to the February issue of the Automobile Color Index, published by the Duco Color Advisory Service. Green follows closely, while blue is "at its lowest ebb in seventeen months."

And what of maroon? The Index asserts that this hue has long been popular with the motoring public but it appears that manufacturers regarded it unfavorably because of the "price penalty" it imposed. Now, however, "non-bleeding," durable maroons that do not require a ground coat are available, and the manufacturers, particularly of medium and low priced cars, are expected to release these tints to a breathless public.

The outlook for gray looks very cloudy, as demand for it, never very strong, has diminished almost to the vanishing point.

IN THE LAND OF MASQUERADE AND CARNIVAL

AT THE WHEEL

By JAMES O. SPEARING

THERE are two things to do with a road. The first is to build it, the second is to tell people about it. Likewise, if the road has already been built but needs improvement of any kind, the work should be done and the people told. It isn't a case of putting one job before the other, however. Construction and information go together. The idea is that the benefit of a good road depends upon tha number of people who know about it and the evil of a bad road is increased by the number of people who try to use it without knowing about it. Roads should be constantly built and improved, and the public always informed. Those who drive automobiles on business or pleasure can then select the best routes available to them and, when they can't avoid places where construction work is going on or needed, they can at least make allowances with the patience induced by foreknowledge while they make the progress permitted by conditions.

Some of the States of this approximate Union officially realize this. Through their highway departments, they regularly issue maps, magazines and mimeographed bulletins which disseminate information about their roads. The practice has not yet been adopted by all the States, however. Only a possible majority are conscious of the value of telling the public what they are doing while they are doing it. Why aren't they all?

* * *

The publications of the conscious States appear in various forms and styles. New York, for instance, issues a large clear map twice a month, between May and November, on which all the roads of the State are designated with superimposed lines and crosses in red to indicate detours and delays. The exact nature of each of these hindrances to travel is stated at the bottom of the map, so that any one planning a trip may first select his route by reference to the map, avoiding red wherever possible, and then advise himself of just what difficulties he will unavoidably encounter. Highways are numbered on the map and in the list, so their identification is easy. On the reverse side of the map there are diagrams of the main streets through the principal cities of the State and a mileage table showing the distances between cities and towns. Altogether, the New York map is one of the most accurate and usable publications of its kind in the country.

Similar maps are issued periodically by Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and other States. The last issue of the Massachusetts map, for the Fall and Winter of 1929-30, appeared on Oct. 1, showing road conditions at that time, with the suggestion that they would remain virtually the same until Spring, and the final seasonal edition of the Pennsylvania map, published last January, designated the highways included in the Winter's snow removal program. Both maps also contain additional information of value to the motorist.

Instead of maps, some States issue mimeographed bulletins listing hindrances to traffic caused by construction and repair work. Unless a person is familiar with the designations of the roads he wishes to use, these bulletins must be consulted in connection with a standard map. This makes the bulletins less readily serviceable than the maps of New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, but the information is there for those who want it and no really arduous labor is required to pick it out.

* * *

The Connecticut bulletin, for instance, lists the numbered routes passing through the State and then the roads not designated by numbers but indicated, in most cases, by the names of towns. Any one may identify the road he wishes to use from a map of Connecticut and then determine its condition by reference to its number or name in the bulletin.

* * *

New Jersey doesn't make it as easy as that, however. This State's bulletin lists the roads in counties, instead of in the State as a whole. Any one planning to drive across the State must first ascertain what counties his route traverses and then look it up in sections under separate county headings. Counties are not counted by most motorists. They drive from the bailiwick of one Sheriff into that of another without knowing that they have crossed a boundary line. If one is faced with the unfamiliar problem of figuring out a route through the counties between Jersey City and Camden, therefore, he is likely to feel somewhat the same confusion as a mathematical novice suddenly confronted with the square root of minus one. Furthermore, counties are not designated at all on some maps, and on others their names and boundary lines are so obscurely indicated that the attempt to find them is like looking for the concealed cat in a puzzle drawing. All of which often makes it difficult for a motorist to avail himself of the information contained in the New Jersey bulletin. It's too well contained.

While maps and bulletins seem adequate in some States, others more ambitiously publish periodicals entitled to classification as magazines. The last issue of the New Mexico Highway Journal, for instance, is bound in heavy paper and contains forty pages of road information, articles, photographs and advertisements. It is one of the most pretentious publications of its kind, and though it is in a sense a booster magazine, its writers seem more bent on being interesting than on blowing hard about New Mexico.

In the issue referred to, dated December, 1929, there is an article on the building of the original Santa Fé Trail, begun in 1825, in which the author, F. T. Cheetham, details the political movements by the United States and Mexico with respect to the road and the pioneer work of the engineers who laid out its course. It is interesting to note that the Mexican Government of the period objected to the construction of a road "from the western frontier of the State of Missouri to the boundary line of the United States," because it "regarded all movements on the part of the United States toward Texas and New Mexico with jealous apprehension." Henry Clay, then Secretary of State of the United States, expressed regret at the attitude of the Mexican Government and declared that "the road was intended for a purely commercial purpose." He said it would benefit the people of both countries "by the exchanges which it would facilitate," and he assured the Mexican Government that "no misconception could be greater than that of its having originated in view of territorial acquisition."

So the Santa Fé Trail, into what was then Mexican territory, was built and a treaty between the two governments was finally ratified. Then "American traders openly entered Santa Fé and the trade grew by leaps and bounds. American influence grew in the same proportion, so that when the American soldier entered the Territory he did not have to fire a shot to gain admission. The country was won already."

* * *

Alabama, Arizona, North Dakota and other States also publish highway magazines which contain special articles, poetry, jokes and pictures in addition to advice and information about roads. They are meant for reading as well as reference.

THE NEWS FROM DETROIT

By FRED KINGSBURY.

DETROIT.

SLIGHT gains in output were registered at nearly all the automobile manufacturing plants in the Detroit distri during the past week. No large increases were registered at any point, although the trend in production is upward. Indications at the present time are that no great gains will be made before March 1, when the annual Spring buying is expected to begin.

There is nothing new in this procedure, as it has been the trend nearly every year. Of course, this year is considerably behind 1929, but this was anticipated, and manufacturers are operating very close to dealer requirements. They intend that there shall be no overstocking of cars at any point in the United States.

* * *

The eyes of nearly all the motor car manufacturers are turned toward foreign countries at the present time. They are very hopeful of good export business this year, but they are not saying much about it. The export units of all the big factories are working hard to sell cars. This is especially true with regard to South America and Australia, where automobiles of American manufacture are becoming more and more popular.

* * *

The outlook in the truck industry has greatly improved in the last seven days. Many inquiries have been received for heavy-duty trucks especially. With the gains being made in the building industry in the Middle and Far West, considerable business is anticipated. Good business in buses also is foreseen. The trend appears to be away from the small units, th larger chassis being in greater demand.

A trip to the Canadian plants of American automobile manufacturers, just across the river from Detroit, shows that business is gaining in those factories. Officials of the plants were unanimous in saying that they expected a normal year's business, and called attention to the crop reports for 1929. They are of the opinion that the agricultural districts will absorb a large number of cars during the next few months.

AUTOMOBILE MERCHANTS HOLD ANNUAL MEETING

AT the annual business meeting of the Automobile Merchants Association of New York, Inc., held in the Fisk Building on Feb. 6, the following were elected to serve on the board of directors for a period of two years: C. H. Larson, R. B. Cole, H. Happersberg, A. G. Southworth, George Stowe and C. B. Warren. J. B. Hulett, chairman of the nominating committee, placed these names before the meeting. In the absence of President Larson, Mr. Cole, first vice president, presided.

It was announced that the annual banquet of the association would be held March 6. Seventy new members, according to E. W. Headington, chairman of the membership committee, were enrolled in 1929. A membership drive for 1930 will be started on May 1.

As chairman of the traffic committee, Mr. Happersberg urged that work on another tunnel under the Hudson River to connect with the Thirty-eighth Street vehicular tunnel be started immediately. Lee J. Eastman, heading the legislative committee, declared that the association was ready to cooperate with the Empire State Automobile Merchants Association, the up-State organization, by approving those bills which they belileve to be beneficial.

Officers of the association for 1930 will be elected at the meeting of the board of directors immediately after the banquet in March.

TRAFFIC CONTROL STILL NEEDS MEN

Extension of Lights Saves Money and Relieves Policemen, but New Duties Constantly Develop—Force Kept Down

By JOHN T. VOGEL.

THE recurrent waves of red and green which sweep through this metropolis, making fixed lanes of traffic resemble twinkling marine roadways, are splashing blue into the by-ways. The blue belongs to Police Department uniforms. The mechanical eyes are relieving policemen from posts at many busy crossings, but the ever-expanding scope and difficulty of traffic regulation in New York produces new posts and duties for the men relieved.

The city's total police force has nearly doubled in the past ten years. So has the number of men on traffic duty. A decade ago the spread of automobile usage seemed destined to make every policeman a traffic regulator. But the proportion today is what it was in 1920. About one-sixth of the local gendarmerie is regularly on traffic assignments.

To the light-control system goes the credit for holding steady the proportion of men on traffic duty, according to Acting Commissioner Philip D. Hoyt, whose usual job as First Deputy Commissioner is to keep the traffic division in working order. The lights, he feels, are the answer to a seemingly insoluble problem. Men with the height, temperament and other special qualifications for traffic work have been found relatively scarce. Selection and training take time and money. Mechanical control has counteracted a tendency to runaway figures in men and costs.

None of the 2,700 traffic men is being retired because of the lights, however. Too many problems related to the spread of automotive traffic need their attention. An increase of about 100 per cent in automobile registrations within five years means plenty of business for the bluecoats. Just before Commissioner Whalen left for Florida, for instance, he reported that present activities against one-hour parkers with hazy ideas of time were taxing the facilities of the department, and that a constant drive by special summons squads of 150 men was being conducted.

No city that has installed traffic lights has been able to cut down its traffic force. In most cases there has been an increase. Side streets and outlying districts now hum as busily as the main highways and business centres of a few years ago. The police organization has had to spread itself over a much more extensive area.

Along the light-controlled lanes some officers are necessary, not only to untangle mix-ups, but also, as Mr. Hoyt points out, for the psychological effect on drivers who otherwise might get careless. An important gain comes from greater mobility. The mechanical guardian at the crossing allows an officer to deal with an individual case while the traffic flow continues.

The Traffic Division is part of the law-enforcing arm of the city. Crime prevention involves the officer on a fixed traffic post as well as the patrolman on his beat. The duties overlap. To poke a person with an automobile bumper is often as damaging and criminal as to fell him with a piece of lead pipe. However, to get an approximation of what it costs to keep automobilists, street cars and pedestrians separated, one may take a sixth of the total annual Police Department expenditure of about $50,000,000, or about $8,500,000. This might roughly—very roughly—be labeled the cost of traffic regulation.

Probably the automobile has created enough extra business to cover easily the expense items for which it is responsible. This excludes the illegitimate activities of gangland hunched behind the windshield.

Saving Money.

To combat partially this attack on the town's pocketbook, about $1,500,000 stands on the municipality's books for light-control systems installed or under contract. By the end of the year, 5,000 lights will spread their stop-and-go messages throughout the city. Each light during twenty-four hours takes the place of a trio of officers, each at a salary of $3,000 a year. Within the next two or three months, 242 miles will be controlled by one man from a traffic station in Manhattan.

Despite the congestion due to New York's peculiar geographic and economic features, the number of traffic police for each 10,000 persons is somewhat below the average for 103 cities in the United States. This city has the equivalent of about three traffic men per 10,000 citizens, as compared with an average of three and one-half for the other municipalities. Such old-established centres as Newark, Boston and Philadelphia have more; St. Louis, Indianapolis, San Francisco and Rochester get along with fewer.

The ramifications of traffic control and costs extend to the school system, among other parts of the municipal layout. One of the most important duties connected with traffic control in New York, as Mr. Hoyt sees it, is to make sure that a million or more school children get across the streets safely each day. For this purpose, from 1,700 to 1,800 men from patrol precincts are detailed for part-time crossing work. These are in addition to the men doing traffic duty exclusively.

PLAN TO REGULATE BUSES

By WILLIAM ULLMAN.

PROTECTION of the bus-riding public and the stabilization of the motor-coach industry are the objects of the Couzens-Parker bill which seeks to establish Federal regulation of interstate bus operation.

The bill leaves the control of intrastate bus operators to the States. They already regulate this division of motor-bus transportation, but jurisdiction over interstate service has been denied them by the courts.

Certain operators are said to have resorted to the subterfuge of carrying passengers in interstate commerce in order to escape State regulation. Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee, Virginia, South Carolina, Michigan and Iowa have been enjoined by the courts from regulating these lines because of their interstate operations.

Approval of the Couzens-Parker bill has been given by the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, representing the States; the National Association of Motor Bus Operators, the American Association of Railway Executives, the American Electric Railway Association, the American Shortline Railroad Association and the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce.

An important feature of the bill is the requirement of certificates of public convenience and necessity. The House Committee on Interstate Commerce, headed by Representative Parker of New York, is committed to the principle of requiring these certificates, while the bill covers operators already in the business through a "grandfather clause" that would permit them to go ahead with their operations so long as they observed other provisions in the law.

Administration of the law is assigned by the Couzens-Parker bill to the Interstate Commerce Commission and joint boards which would be established and whose membership would be drawn from State regulatory boards already functioning. The decision of a joint board must be adopted, under the terms of the bill, as the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, unless an appeal is taken to the commission.

The commission is also authorized to require security for the adequate protection of the public. This security may take the form of bonds, insurance policies or other provision for the payment of judgments against an operator.

Regulation of rates likewise is provided in the requirement that they shall be "just and reasonable." No charges may be exacted which are greater or less than the rates in effect for regular service. Upon complaint concerning rates the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to institute an investigation and refer the complaint to a joint board for hearing.

Regulation of the irresponsible, fly-by-night operator is seen by those who are engaged in the well-managed enterprises as the outstanding virtue of the Couzens-Parker bill. Representatives of the larger companies, which have huge capital involved, have indicated their willingness to accept Federal regulation.

A CORRECTION.

By a typographical error, in the statement about public liability and property damage insurance rates on passenger automobiles issued by the office of the State Superintendent of Insurance, the rates for heavy and light cars printed in THE NEW YORK TIMES of Feb. 3 were reversed. The rates for medium-weight cars were given correctly.

RADIO INDUSTRY EMERGES FROM TESTS THAT STABILIZE

CHEERFUL TONE SPREADS AS BUSINESS IMPROVES

Inventories Have Been Well Moved, Says Richmond—Price-Cutting Is About Over—Marked Improvement Reported in Radio Trade Circles

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP JR.

THE radio industry is being stabilized. Overproduction instigated the conditions that applied the acid test of survival of the fittest. The year 1929 began with bright prospects. Manufacturers, encouraged by the record sales in 1928, rushed ahead to meet a greater demand. Few stopped to consider that the national political campaign in 1928 stimulated sales and that 1929 would not have that force behind it. Overproduction resulted. Some estimate that 900,000 sets were overproduced; others put the figure at 500,000. A recent survey made by the Manufacturers Association discloses "at overproduction today is fairly well cleaned up. "It is not as bad as some think," said a representative of the R. M. A., while a large manufacturer who had 150,000 sets on hand late in December reports, "we are pleased with current conditions."

Nevertheless 1929 went into history as a banner year, with estimates as high as $850,000,000 spent by the American public for radio apparatus, compared to $690,550,000 in 1928. But the last quarter cast a new light on the situation. The supply was too great for the demand. Manufacturers passed dividends; several are affected by receiverships.

Some Are Cheerful.

Those who survive—those who are still standing—are looking across the 1930 battlefield cheered by the fact that they have met the test and can acclaim, "Veni, vidi, vici!" And they see cut down about them those competitors who failed. They see the radio industry stabilized, with the possibility of increased profit. They expect 1930 to be a good year, especially the last six months; in fact, some estimate that with so much competition eliminated the survivors should show increased profits. They are hopeful that most of the distress merchandise will be cleared away by the time St. Patrick's Day arrives. They expect that factory production will begin to increase around June 1.

During the past two weeks jobbers and dealers report that more merchandise has been moving. This activity is expected to reach the manufacturers before long. Business is showing a turn for the better, according to the Radio Manufacturers Association.

"We have no manufactured sets on hand," said an official of a large company last week. "We only build sets against firm and immediate orders from distributers. They had the smallest stock of our sets on Feb. 1 of any year in the past three years. January, 1930, brought us the largest business of any January in our history. Our inventory consists exclusively of raw materials. We all know that the radio industry has been going through a most drastic period of readjustment, but it should be followed by a stabilized market which has been so much hoped for by the industry."

Richmond Makes a Report.

"Measured in terms of radio sets placed in homes, 1929 was decidedly a better year than was 1928," said H. B. Richmond, president of the R. M. A. "The radio industry experienced some difficulties due to a too ambitious manufacturing program, but this condition is being readjusted rapidly so that we entered 1930 with a well coordinated plan of engineering development, manufacturing, and merchandising. In the long run, the healthier the condition of any industry, the greater the value in purchases obtained by the consumers of the products of that industry."

"January sales of receiving sets and accessories showed marked improvement," Mr. Richmond said at the meeting of the National Federation of Radio Associations held in Cleveland during the past week. "There is a stiffening of prices of radio products. Several manufacturers have announced increased prices since the first of the year and others contemplate similar policy. The recent period of price-cutting is about over. Inventories have been well moved and the radio industry is in a more healthy condition, facing the future with confidence."

Who Will Be at the Show?

Several new models are now being introduced with a stimulating effect upon trade. However, the majority of 1930-31 sets will first appear officially at the annual Radio Trade Show to be held in June at Atlantic City. The radio sales curve begins to turn upward about July 10. From that date until Dec. 20 it climbs to the peak. If business in general moves up from the valley of depression, as signs now indicate it will, the last six months of 1930 ought to please the survivors of the 1929 "panic."

But what about the radio shows in the Autumn? Who will occupy all the booths at Madison Square Garden? That is a problem the Radio Manufacturers Association, sponsor of the exhibition, is now trying to solve. It may be a combined radio-electrical show. One thing is certain, radio itself is not likely to need as much space as heretofore. It may later on, when television arrives. But until that time those who visit the radio shows will see the wares of manufacturers who met the test, "survival of the fittest."

And the fittest will find that radio is a field of unlimited possibilities in which "to him who hath shall be given."

The stabilization of radio as an industry has been going on since 1922. In 1928 a lecturer at the Harvard Graduate School of Business said:

"The radio industry has reached the period of comparative stability. No longer do we see revolutionary announcements and claims that tend to disorganize the industry and make the public wonder as to what is coming next, and stop buying in anticipation of something bigger, better and cheaper. No longer do we have wholesale liquidations by mushroom manufacturers of questionable products closing out at half cost prices. The industry has cleaned its own house, and the field is fairly clear to reputable manufacturers whose self-imposed responsibility is not only to produce a dependable product at a fair price but also to furnish a broadcasting service to the listening public.

The Value of Advertising.

"Touching briefly on the cumulative power of advertising as a business builder, it is interesting to note that every one of the pioneers of the radio industry who have pursued a consistent, year-round, uninterrupted advertising campaign since the beginning, are today highly successful leaders without exception. On the other hand, one-time successful manufacturers who advertised solely during the selling season and who stopped when business slowed up, or who did not advertise on a year-round basis continuously, are today either far down the list of leaders or in most instances out of the running entirely."

There is an indication that the combination radio-phonograph will be popular this year. There seems to be a demand for smaller sets of the console type. Several manufacturers are beginning to flirt with the pentode tube. It has been used in Europe. Americans are experimenting with it and some feel that they may develop it sufficiently to make it the next step upward from the screen-grid. The English tube is an audio amplifier. The American tube is a radio frequency amplifier that strengthens the incoming impulses before they reach the detector, thereby giving them greater power to actuate the detector. It is pointed out that the screen-grid differs from the three-element tube in that it has a second grid. The pentode goes a step further and utilizes still another grid, the function of which is to dissipate the space charge inside the bulb. Ernest Kauer, president of Ceco, builders of tubes, recently demonstrated the pentode in New York.

Future of Pentode Tube.

The announcement which heralded the demonstration read: "Of this new pentode tube you will confidently be able to say that it represents the biggest development in radio since the three-element tube away back in 1906. This tube is three times as powerful as the screen-grid and is capable of being utilized to its full efficiency, if not more so than the present eight, nine and ten tube sets. The engineers have a circuit worked out for it."

Engineers are now busy trying to determine whether or not the pentode has possibilities that may qualify it to lead the next advance in radio receiver design. If it does it is likely to enable the use of fewer tubes, making sets more compact and less expensive to build. However, up to the present no manufacturer has announced that he will use this tube in the 1930-31 models.

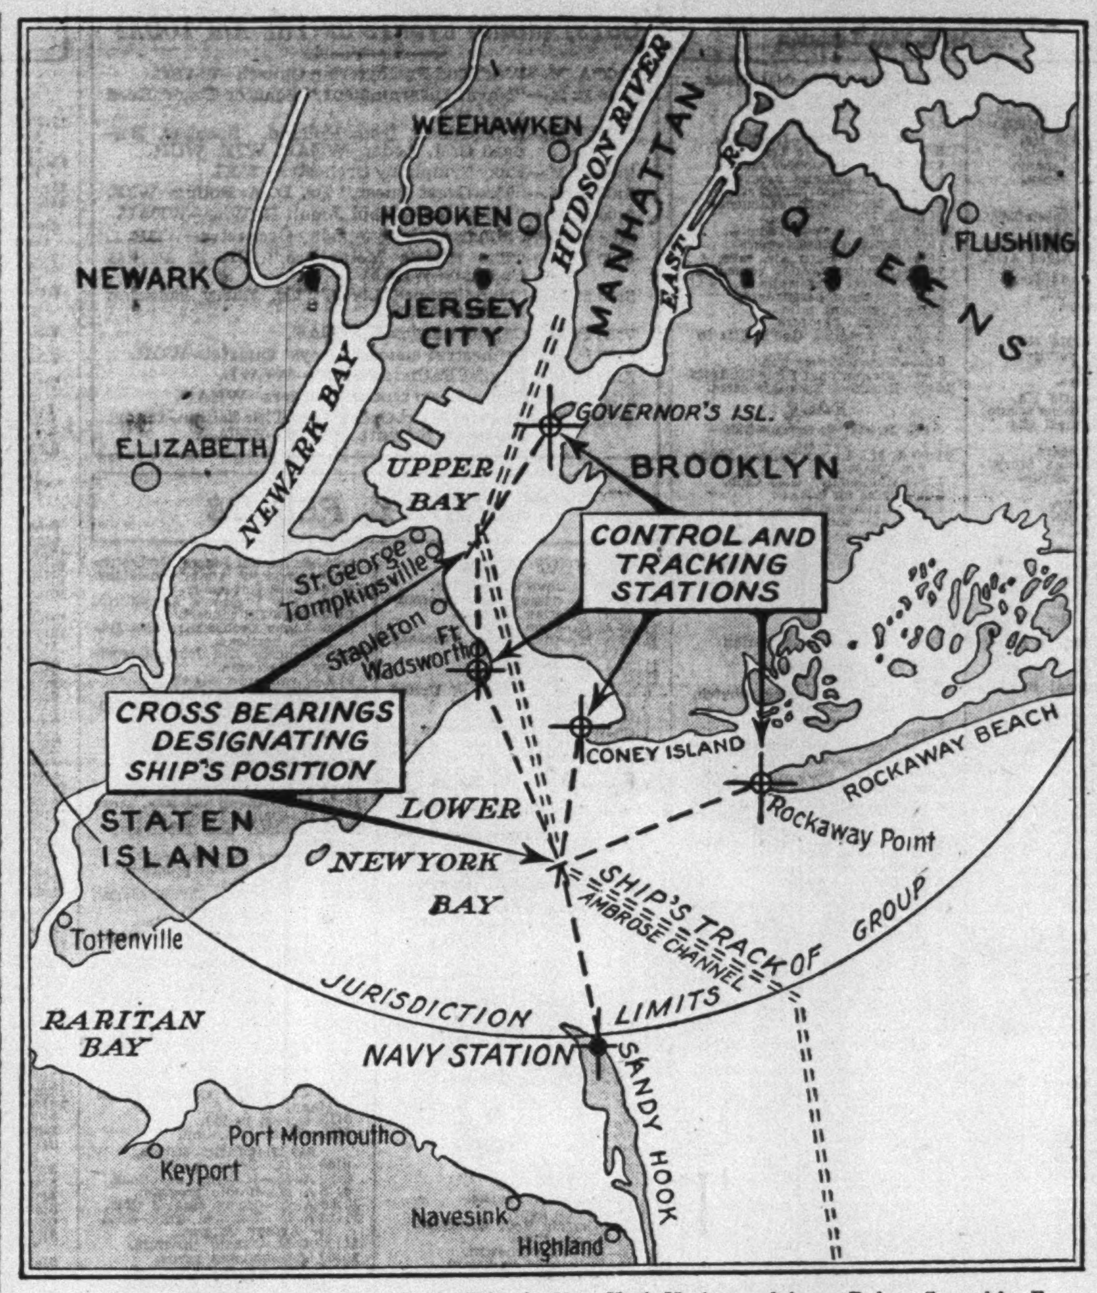
THE NATION TO HEAR PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concerts will be carried to a nation-wide audience during the Winter season of 1930-31, according to the terms of a contract which calls for the exclusive broadcasting of these concerts by the Columbia network. The series begins on Oct. 5. WOR is broadcasting the concerts this season.

The broadcasts will be picked up from Carnegie Hall, the Metropolitan Opera House and the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Philharmonic Society's ten children's concerts as well as five young people's concerts under the direction of Ernest Schelling, will also be broadcast exclusively by the WABC network.

BYRD'S RADIO TOWERS TO GUARD THE CAMP.

Malcolm P. Hanson, chief radio man of the Byrd Antarctic Expedition, reports that the three steel radio towers that project up from the snow of Little America will be left standing there when the explorers sail away. They will stand to mark the site of Byrd's camp unless the fury of the winds in the Land of Blizzards decides that they should be blown down for burial in the snow and ice.



Radio Compass System Proposed to Guide Ships in New York Harbor and Avert Delays Caused by Fog.

INVISIBLE PILOT OFFERED TO SHIPS

Plan Proposed for Compass Stations to Avert Financial Loss Caused by Delay, Collision And Grounding of Vessels in Fog

By E. J. PILKINGTON,
Radio Engineer, Boston Navy Yard.

THE heavy fogs which envelop New York City from time to time, causing the retardation and in a great many instances the complete paralyzation of major ship movements, in turn involving heavy financial losses, can all be compensated for by use of the radio compass. In navy circles direction and position finding by radio has been lately developed to a level where, with present equipment, it has reached practically a precision basis.

The careful and judicious site selection and construction of three or four direction-finding stations located along the channel from Rockaway Inlet to Governors Island would enable a group of municipally owned radio direction finders to move shipping in and out and along the channel with impunity during weather with attending poor visibility.

A combination of stations should be centrally controlled from Governors Island through the medium of rented commercial telegraph or telephone lines or by municipally owned underwater communication cables. A commission of harbor pilots could assist in the proper selection of the most suitable and advantageous sites. In many instances permission of Coast Guard and lighthouse authorities can be obtained for use of part of their property for such purposes.

All inbound or outbound vessels wishing to drop or take aboard pilots from the pilot boat off Ambrose Light could resort to a ship's radio compass in locating each other in thick weather. Transatlantic and coastwise steamships in the vicinity of Ambrose Light would be out of the jurisdiction of the inland group, and would use the usual ship's direction finder on radio beacons and navy shore stations for their aids in departure or approach.

Entering the Lower Channel.

Upon entering the lower channel during poor visibility a particular ship is required to immediately call the metropolitan group and obtain a fix before proceeding at a cautious speed on the right-hand side of the buoyed channel. At the end of every fifteen to thirty-minute intervals this same ship will continue to obtain crosses or fixes as it proceeds to its berth, either in the North or East Rivers (if that be its destination); likewise each incoming or outgoing vessel would be required to go through the some procedure, constantly checking its position through the shore control station. This control station is equipped with a modern transmitter, at which would be found a well-trained personnel whose duties would be to accurately track on a large scale map or chart (of the approaches to New York) all inbound and outbound shipping moving in the restricted areas of the harbor.

By means of colored pins or marked tags the position of each ship would be indicated at the time of each set of bearings or fixes. With such a method of location it would be safe for all ships equipped with radio to move in and out of New York harbor at will. When ships are steaming in opposite directions they can be warned by the control station of their close proximity, and, thus informed, take necessary precautions in passing. Shipping not properly equipped with radio will have to follow the usual procedure, and that is to steam to anchorage out of the way and wait for the weather to clear. Vessels departing from their docks in the North or East Rivers or elsewhere notify the control station through their respective terminal offices fifteen minutes before they clear their lines and again when they are swinging into midstream. From then on they are in close touch by radio with the radio position-finding stations ready to follow emergency instructions.

Undoubtedly many of the large ocean type of vessels are moved at night to facilitate easy passage, as considerable congestion exists during the day off lower Manhattan, due to ferry service. At the short range which the proposed group would work, all bearings would be just as accurate at night as during the day. The usual erratic bearings experienced at present shore establishments at certain heights of the Heaviside layer on long-distance radio compass observations during the night would be entirely absent here.

Preventing Interference.

To prevent a jam or transmission interference during the peak load of such a group, it would be wise to have two transmitters at the control station, one sending on one frequency for bearing observations and another sending on a frequency slightly lower for routine traffic, such as the results of the observations, warnings, &c.

The cost for the construction and manning of such a group of direction-finding stations would nowhere equal the financial losses due to delay, collision and grounding of ships in the harbor area annually. Some years avoidable money losses to a few transportation companies mount into millions, especially through the accidental loss of a ship. The estimated cost for the equipping and building of four complete radio direction-finder stations, including one year's salary for twenty operators, would be about $150,000. If living quarters for the men were excluded, this would reduce the first year's outlay of money to $100,000. In submitting this proposal only the major points have been considered, without outline as to detail.

Cartoonists will be guests of honor at the Advertising Club luncheon to be broadcast on Wednesday afternoon at 1:15 over WEAF. Rube Goldberg as master of ceremonies will be introduced by Edwin S. MEISSNER SEEKS RADIO UTOPIA WITH A HUMLESS VACUUM TUBE

HUMLESS radio tubes, which are called the key to relief for owners whose receivers suffer from this malady of reception, besides being the basis of less expensive set construction, were demonstrated recently at the Short Hills (N. J.) laboratory of their inventor, Benjamin F. Meissner.

Mr. Meissner used an ordinary resistance amplifier circuit, in which he placed, one after another, various types of tubes found on the radio market today. He also placed in the socket tubes of the new design. All were operated under the same conditions as in a modern alternating current receiver, which receives its power from the alternating current lighting line. He pointed out that the standard tubes produce various degrees of hum. The Meissner tubes, when operated under precisely the same conditions as the other bulbs, produced no audible hum.

Mr. Meissner followed his audible demonstration with a visible one. He attached the output of the amplifier to an oscillograph, which throws a picture of the wave on a luminous screen. The tubes which generated hum showed varying degrees of curved lines. Without making any changes in his laboratory set-up, Mr. Meissner pulled out the hum tube and placed in the socket one of the humless type. The line of light, being a picture of the influence of the various voltages in an operating vacuum tube on the bulb's output, or what it passes on to the succeeding tube in the receiver, did not waver. There was no evidence of any fluctuation. The line of light was absolutely straight.

The inventor said his vacuum tubes will make the problem of designing sets for humless reception an easy one in the future. They will also, he declares, make sets cheaper because designers need not take so many precautions to prevent or balance out hum waves produced by hum tubes. The less the hum from the tubes, the less the precautions which the designer must take with expensive auxiliary apparatus in sets, to guard against the hum getting to the loud-speaker. Power units may be more simple and inexpensive, and less cost to the consumer, he said.

Hum often does not become audible until the carrier wave of a station is tuned in. The tubes may be, and invariably are, responsible, he declares, for the hum if all stations cause hum in the set. This means that trouble introduced by the hum tubes modulates or acts upon the carrier wave to produce hum in the speaker. Many set owners and radio service men believe or tell their clients that the hum is not from the receiver, but is coming from the broadcasting station, since it enters the speaker as each wave is tuned in. Mr. Meissner said this is far from the case many times. He believes that the tubes are to blame.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

A Cure for Broad Tuning—Ground Wire Should Be Short—How to Present a Program Idea to A Broadcasting Station

QUESTION—I recently purchased an all-electric eight-tube screen grid radio. It employs four No. 224 screen-grid tubes, two 245 power tubes in push-pull, one 227 tube and one 280 rectifier. The tone is excellent, but selectivity is poor. I have an outdoor antenna which has been in use for four years. When I disconnect the aerial the selectivity is good. Do you think that an aerial of four years' service would impair the selectivity? (2) Are there any other possible reasons for the set acting in this manner?—D. O. B. ANSWER—It would be a good plan to install a new antenna, shorter than the present one. Make the ground wire as short as possible. (2) The antenna is too long.

QUESTION—I have an original idea for a fifteen or twenty minute program, something that is not being given at any station. What steps must I take to arrange a try-out at a station?—L. D. ANSWER—See the program director of the station from which you desire to broadcast.

QUESTION—I have a Colonial Cavalier. Lately I have been getting a light crackling noise, which only seems to come when I get WEAF. It is not noticeable on other stations. The noise is similar to static. If I stamp on the floor the noice is increased. I have checked the ground and the aerial connections are all right. I have an idea it might be one of the tubes. What is the real trouble?—G. W. P. ANSWER—The symptom indicates a loose connection or a defective tube, but in either case it ought to affect the other stations in the same way. It might be that some electrical device in the vicinity is causing interference on WEAF's channel and that it is not heard on the other waves because the volume control is not turned up as high as is often necessary to get WEAF as loud as WJZ, WOR or WABC.

QUESTION—I have a six-tube direct current radio and wish to make use of the electric light wire as an antenna. I have tried using various fixed condensers in series with the light wires and aerial post and found the reception of certain stations was very satisfactory, while reception of other stations was extremely poor. What condenser or hook-up could I use that would produce results from a light wire antenna equivalent to that of an outdoor aerial?—R. O. B. ANSWER—The antenna light socket unit is the safest way to use the lighting line as an antenna; however, in nine cases out of ten a good outdoor antenna will give superior results as far as tone, volume, distance and selectivity are concerned.

QUESTION—When I turn on my set I have almost twice the power for about a half minute after it starts working as I have after that time. After a period of about a half minute the volume drops rapidly to about half the original volume. After that it works with no apparent defect whatsoever, the lower volume remaining constant. I am at a loss to understand this change of volume. What do you suppose may be the cause? The first tube is an antenna ballast. I have tested transformers, condensers, &c., and can find no apparent defect. As the set works I have logged about 150 stations from Canada to Havana and from Boston to the Rockies. I use an indoor antenna chiefly and am two lots from a power substation, hum from whose transformers is received occasionally. I also use an outside aerial and a ground aerial, but find the indoor aerial more effective. (2) What will cause a 280 tube to go blue? Does this decrease the efficiency of the tube and set? I had a tube go blue, but changed it. The one I now use is not blue.—W. R. S. ANSWER—There is probably a tube in the circuit the function of which is to automatically to regulate the volume. Some tubes will give tremendous volume when first turned on, but as they heat up their control of the volume becomes normal. Another tube will clear up the trouble. (2) Gas in the tube, which usually decreases the tube's efficiency.

QUESTION—I have a five-tube neutrodyne about four years old. It is connected by a trickle charger to the alternating house current. The loud-speaker is continually going "dead." It first has a whistling squeal and then dies out completely. I have had three new storage batteries of 90 ampères each and it seems that the batteries run down, although the trickle charger works to the extent of getting warm. The five tubes are more than three years old, but they light up well. My dealer advises me that the set is at fault, yet it performs all right when the batteries are charged.—W. C. S. ANSWER—First of all a new set of tubes should be installed. The fact that the filaments light is no indication that they are not worn out. Tubes in use that long should be replaced.

STATIONS TO SHIFT WAVES

Forty-six Broadcasters Affected by Federal Commission's Order — New Channel Proposed for WHAM, Rochester, and WKEN, Buffalo

FORTY-SIX broadcasters are affected by the latest order issued by the Federal Radio Commission specifying changes in wave lengths. Eighteen stations are affected by the wave shifts to be made on March 2 in the 1,460, 1,470, 1,480 and 1,490 kilocycle bands. These broadcasters are in the 201 to 205 meter area where howls caused by overcrowding have been bad. It is hoped that the changes will avert cross-talk and interference.

There are twenty-eight other stations now on cleared channels which the commission has asked to cooperate in a new plan without setting a date when the shift will be made definite. Insufficient geographical separation of these stations is given as the reason why changes are necessary.

The stations ordered to go on different assignments March 2, with their new frequencies, follow:

WFBL, Syracuse, 1,300 kilocycles.
WKBW, Amherst, N. Y., 1,480.
WHBO, Auburn, N. Y., 1,310.
WLEX, Lexington, Mass., 1,410.
WSSH, Boston, 1,410.
WMAF, Dartmouth, Mass., 1,410.
WTNT, Nashville, 1,470.
WLAC, Nashville, 1,470.
KPWF, Westminster, Cal., 1,490.
WCKY, Crescent Springs, Ky., 1,490.
WORD, Batavia, Ill., 1,490.
WSOA, Deerfield, Ill., 1,490.
WJAZ, Mount Prospect, Ill., 1,490.
KFJF, Oklahoma City, 1,480.
KGA, Spokane, 1,470.
WJSV, Mt. Vernon Hills, Va., 1,460.
KSTP, St. Paul, 1,460.
WLEY, Lexington, Mass., 1,470.

Cleared channel broadcasters affected by the proposed plan, with the new kilocycle assignments, are:

WHAM, Rochester, N. Y., 1,160.
WKEN, Buffalo, N. Y., 1,060.
WHAS, Louisville, Ky., 1,020.
KYW, Chicago, 1,140.
KTHS, Hot Springs, Ark., 1,070.
KRLD, Dallas, 1,070.
WTAM, Cleveland, 1,080.
WBT, Charlotte, N. C., 1,040.
KMOX, St. Louis, 1,110.
WRVA, Richmond, Va., 1,150.
KSL, Salt Lake City, 1,090.
WAPI, Tulsa, Okla., 1,130.
KVOO, Birmingham, Ala., 1,130.
WOWO, Fort Wayne, Ind., 1,160.
WWVA, Wheeling, W. Va., 1,160.
WCAU, Philadelphia, 820.
KOB, State College, N. M., 1,170.
KEX, Portland, Ore., 1,170.

This is the most widespread shift in wave lengths since the nation-wide reallocation of channels was made on Nov. 11, 1928.

With President Hoover in Florida on a vacation until about Feb. 19, members of the Radio Commission are becoming uneasy as the end of their terms, Feb. 23, approaches. While there have been numerous rumors as to the personnel of the new commission, the President has maintained a Coolidge silence.

It was said at the White House that the names of the new commissioners will not be sent to the Senate until the President returns. Since it is not believed that any names the President sends will be approved in the short space of time elapsing between the time the President returns to Washington and the expiration of the terms of the members of the commission, the question is being asked just what will happen to radio control during that time, especially so since the licenses of some thirty-odd station expire March 1.

A radio version of "Kitchen Colonel," a story by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman will be presented at 7:30 o'clock on Tuesday night over WEAF's network. The rôle of Old Abel Lee, the back porch campaigner, will be portrayed by Arthur Allen.

HARDY LICHENS THRIVE EVEN IN FROZEN WASTES

Dr. Gould's Find in the Heart of Antarctica Illustrates the Unique Character of the Plant, Which Survives Even An Ice Age—Found All Over the Earth

IMPORTANT contributions to lichenology are anticipated as part of the scientific achievements of the Byrd expedition. In the records of the sledging party that made its way over glacier and crevasse amid the mountain ramparts of Antarctica, Dr. Lawrence M. Gould, leader and geologist, has noted the occurrence of lichens at a point further south than they have ever before been found. Explorers have come upon these humble but hardy plants at various places on the northern edge of the ice-covered continent, and now they have been observed in the Queen Maud Mountains, about 300 miles from the South Pole.

That any sort of vegetation should survive in those vast wastes of snow and ice is a matter of astonishment to the layman. But the discovery fails to surprise the botanist. His specimens have come already from too many unexpected places. The only fact needed to account for Dr. Gould's find, according to Dr. Robert S. Williams, specialist of the New York Botanical Gardens, is the outcropping of a bit of rock in that frozen world for at least a little while during the growing season.

No other known plant can stand what the lichen can endure, Dr. Williams explained. It thrives easily in temperatures of 50 and 60 degrees below zero. He doubts if there is a place on the earth that is too cold for it. Neither does it mind wind. For sustenance it asks only air and moisture, and for months at a time it will live buried in ice and snow. But it will not grow on ice; it must have a bit of rock to which to attach itself, and this bit of rock must be exposed to the air for at least a part of the year. If this condition is fulfilled, according to Dr. Williams, there is no reason why lichens should not grow even further south than the Queen Maud Mountains.

What interests the lichen specialist chiefly in Dr. Gould's discovery is the type of his specimens. Dr. Williams would not even hazard a guess as to what they are like, so varied is the family of lichens, so numerous its branches, and so widely distributed under different conditions a single species may be. Besides, there is always the possibility that a new species may have been added. The kinds of lichens number thousands; one species has almost 350 varieties.

There are tiny, pin-like lichens dotting tree stumps; huge curly ones, that look like leather with a sooty underside, that spread over the surface of a rock from the minute disks holding them to it. There are delicate, lacy-looking lichens of fantastic patterns and knotty seaweed-like ones. Still another kind suggests long tresses of curly hair. One frizzled black variety drapes trees after the fashion of Spanish moss, which, Dr. Williams pointed out, by the way, is neither a moss nor a lichen, but a member of the pineapple family. Some are green, some yellow, some red.

The one thing in common among all the lichens is their lack of leaves, flowers, roots and stems. They consist of nothing except branches. In the layman's mind they are often confused with mosses, but mosses are a higher order of plant. Their closest kin are the algae, those minute plant organisms that grow in water. In fact, lichens have been called "aerial algae."

One idea of their nature, Dr. Williams explained, is that they are a union of alga and fungus. On the surface, it is held, the lichen is a fungus, but inside it is an alga, as indicated by the "string of green beads" of its cross-section—no more nor less than green cells of chlorophyl which a fungus never shows. This dual nature of the plant, it is believed, is what enables it to live under conditions where neither the alga nor the fungus could survive. The enclosed alga, according to the theory, is protected and nourished by the fungus, and in its turn it manufactures carbohydrates to feed the fungus.

Lichens are most commonly associated with arctic regions. There, where the vegetation is scarce at best, they appear of most importance. They are conspicuous for the way in which a species will spread, covering acres of rock or barren soil with a spongy mass into which the foot sinks several inches. These plants are found in far greater variety in other parts of the world, however, attaching themselves not only to rocks and the bare ground but also to the bark of trees, to dead wood and other places where they meet no competition from other plants. One variety actually grows unattached on the surface of the ground, in layers from three to six inches deep. This is the "manna lichen" to be found on the arid steppes of various regions from Algeria to Tartary.

World-Wide Distribution.

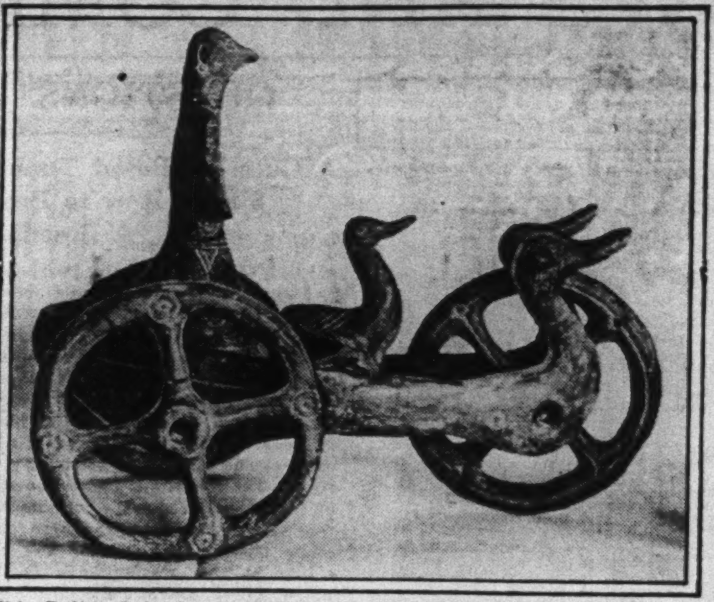
No other plant is so widely distributed as the lichen. It grows in the hottest as well as the coldest countries, but in the tropics it is generally found among the mountains or in high valleys. It has been found on the greatest mountain heights man has reached, on projecting rocks far above the snow line. One will not find many lichens close to New York as they are easily affected by noxious substances in the atmosphere of cities, but in the mountains near by they are not uncommon. They are particularly abundant in the Rocky Mountains and in California.

The Golden Gate of San Francisco, Dr. Williams pointed out, is a lichen product, since it is from the color of the lichens covering the surface of the rocks that the harbor's mouth is named. Lichens may be cooled to low temperatures and heated to high temperatures without injury, so great is their power of resistance. They do not wither, though they may dry out until they could be crushed to a powder at a blow; even then, however, they will revive if supplied with water.

The life story of many lichens consists of periods of activity when moisture is plentiful, alternating with periods of suspended animation under conditions of dryness. Many lichens grow so slowly that years pass before they begin to bear spores; but as a rule they are exceedingly long-lived.

Lichens are traceable far back into history, though the ancients knew little of their real nature. Theophrastus makes mention of the plant; and one variety has been identified in ancient Egyptian coffins, in which the soft, springy material was used to fill empty space. During the middle ages lichens were extensively used as curatives in Europe. A variety that resembles lung tissue was once administered to consumptives; another kind was looked on as a specific against hydrophobia. Even today "Iceland moss" is seen in the shops of druggists, who sell it as a demulcent for dyspepsia and chest complaints.

VOTIVE CHARIOT MADE OF EARTH



This Relic of Ancient Art, Found in a Yugoslav Village, Is Believed to Have Been Fashioned 1,000 Years Before Christ.

CHARIOT OF BAKED CLAY BELIEVED 2,900 YEARS OLD

Found in the Banat, Yugoslavia, It Bears the Symbols of a Prehistoric Religion

BELGRADE.

THE recent discovery of a three-wheeled votive chariot of baked clay has aroused great interest among archaeologists in Belgrade. Two archaeologists, Dr. Vlada Petkovitch and Dr. Josip Petrovitch, give B. C. 1000 as the probable date of the chariot.

The chariot was found in the small village of Dupljaja near the town of Vrshatz, in the Banat, by a builder who kept the discovery to himself for several years before deciding to offer it for sale. The existence of this treasure was brought to the notice of the Belgrade Museum some time ago, but was kept secret pending negotiations for its purchase.

The car bears the effigy of a bird-headed deity, legless and with a bell-shaped body. It is thought that it may represent the son of the god to whose service the car was dedicated, and who is, in all probability, a sun deity. The fingers of the effigy's hands are only indicated by marks drawn on the clay. In the ground, near the chariot, was found an object of baked clay formed like a lid and it is thought that it was possibly used as a kind of shield to protect the chariot.

Dr. Petrovitch said that quite a number of votive chariots had been found in different parts of Europe, but the majority are made of bronze or other metals, very few being of clay. On a chariot found in Milavedja in Czechoslovakia there is a relief of the sun; on the chariot found in Switzerland there is a large female figure, representing the Great Mother and round her are clustered small male figures, all armed. The chariot found at Glasinac, Bosnia, has a bird's figure on it; this chariot is now in the Vienna Museum. All these chariots are made of metal. The only exception is the chariot in Este, Italy, which has four clay wheels.

In face of the evidence now before them Belgrade archaeologists are inclined to think that the broken remains of a clay chariot in the Vrshatz Museum may also be those of a three-wheeled votive car. When the keeper of the Vrshatz Museum came into possession of this chariot it had only two wheels, the other wheels, as he thought, having been lost owing to the breaking of the beam, but it now seems highly probable that there had only been one other wheel.

CHICAGO, Dec. 31.—Official commendation from the council of the American Library Association was given today to THE NEW YORK TIMES and other newspapers printing editions on paper stock of lasting quality. A resolution introduced by H. M. Lydenberg, assistant director of the New York Public Library, expressed appreciation of the service rendered to libraries in the introduction of "rag" paper editions, which defy the ravages of time.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to THE NEW YORK TIMES as the first newspaper to issue these special editions on rag stock," said Mr. Lydenberg in urging passage of the resolution.

U. S. IN CLEAN SWEEP FOR RACQUETS CUP

Pell Leads Americans to Decisive Victory Over English Challengers to Retain Trophy.

WIN ALL FOUR MATCHES

Pell Defeats Lord Aberdare With Invincible Service—Mortimer Beats Kemp-Welch.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

Repeating his victory over Lord Aberdare in the Gold Racquet tournament at Tuxedo, Clarence C. Pell led the American racquets team to a sweeping victory over the English challengers for the International Racquets Cup yesterday as the defenders took all four singles matches at the Racquet and Tennis Club.

With the point they scored on Friday, when two doubles engagements were contested, the Americans captured the series by the margin of 5 matches to 1 and thus retained the handsome trophy offered in competition in 1928 by the club on Park Avenue.

Not only did the defenders win the series by a decisive margin, but also in the two feature matches of yesterday's play Pell and Stanley G. Mortimer, the two men who have held a monopoly on the honors of the game in this country since 1915, overwhelmed their English opponents. In the amazingly brief space of twenty minutes Pell defeated Lord Aberdare at 15—2, 15—1, 15—3, and Mortimer, playing in the same superb form he showed in the doubles, was completely the master of the situation all the way in vanquishing Peter Kemp-Welch at 15—10, 15—6, 15—3.

Two Matches Go to Five Games.

The other two singles matches went to five games, and in one of them it was only by the narrow margin of 2 points that the verdict was reached in the American player's favor. In this match Hewitt Morgan, the ablest exponent of the drop shot in the American amateur ranks, defeated Dr. H. W. Leatham at 17—14, 8—15, 8—15, 15—11, 18—16, coming through in spite of the fact that the British player had considerably the better service of the two.

E. M. Edwards of Philadelphia, the only member of the American team not a resident of this city, scored the other victory. In the fourth singles match he defeated Duncan Cambridge at 4—15, 15—7, 15—6, 8—15, 15—1.

Another large gallery sat in attendance on the final day of play, and seldom has a gathering been stirred to such vociferous applause as was evoked by the play of Pell. For fifteen years Pell has been the outstanding figure in American racquets, and during that period he has won the national crown no fewer than nine times out of the thirteen that it has been played for. It was the decided opinion of those who have watched him in action during all those years that Pell never played better racquets than he did yesterday.

Pell's Play Never Better.

Malcolm D. Whitman, former lawn tennis champion and an able player in his day of both racquets and court tennis, said that he had never seen Pell play so well, while Rex Fincke, amateur racquets champion in 1907, 1911 and 1912, could not remember when he had seen him play any better.

The most impressive feature of Pell's game was his service. It was so absolutely untakable that it would have been sufficient almost in itself to have won the match for him. At least half of his points were scored on service, and the way was paved for the winning of many more by Lord Aberdare's inability to gain the attack in returning it.

So accurately did Pell place his service and with such beautiful length to score nicks at the back wall that Lord Aberdare was compelled to run in and try to take it on the volley. But the wary Pell always met this manoeuvre by placing the ball close up against the side wall, and as a consequence the English player was vainly trying to play it on the half volley.

The invincibility of Pell's delivery was enough in itself to have discouraged most players, but on top of that he was putting the ball into the corners with such withering, low drives that Lord Aberdare was continually

WORLD'S RECORD SET BY ELDER IN DASH

Sprint Star, in Final Race of Career, Lowers Figures for 60 Meters to 0:07.

N. Y. U. TEAM WINS TITLE

Captures Met. A. A. U. Crown With 30 Points in Crescent Meet —Dr. Martin Takes 1,000.

By ARTHUR J. DALEY.

Jack Elder slipped loose from the brackets in which he is paired with other sprinters for world's records by setting a new universal standard at 60 meters at the Thirteenth Regiment Armory last night. The Notre Dame graduate, who is linked with four dash men for the world's 60-yard mark and with Hank Russell for the 75-yard standard, gained personal possession of a record by clipping two-tenths of a second off the figures of 0:07 2-10 made by Bob McAllister in 1927 and equaled by Karl Wildermuth this season.

Elder's brilliant performance furnished the outstanding achievement at the Metropolitan A. A. U. championships, conducted under the auspices of the Crescent A. C., and shunted into the background the title games themselves in which the special sprint series was merely an added feature.

Once before during the evening the hero of the Notre Dame-Army football game had sped over the hardwood floor to win at fifty yards in the near record time of 0:05 6-10. But when the South Bend tornado toed the mark in the 60-meter test few of the 4,000 spectators were aware of the fact that they were witnessing Elder's track valedictory. Just before he crouched down he confided to Starter Johnny McHugh that the race would be the last of his career.

Four Watches Catch Time.

And Elder's last burst was quite as sensational as his first entry into prominence when he defeated Percy Williams, Canada's previously undefeated Olympic champion, a year ago. There could be no questioning the time in which Elder was caught. Four watches clicked at seven seconds flat and one was two-tenths above even time.

Thundering down the floor to the low rumble of excited spectators, Elder flashed in a winning race from the crack of the gun. He was a stride ahead at the getaway and five feet in front of Jimmy Pappas as his muscled body snapped the tape.

And thus did a glorious athletic career come to a close. Elder had become in the short space of three

N. Y. U. FIVE CRUSHES MANHATTAN, 29 TO 7

Holds Rivals to a Field Goal Each Half, Leading at Intermission, 11-3.

LEFFT MAKES 15 POINTS

Violet Centre Takes Scoring Honors—Playing of Nemecek and Shuman Big Factor.

New York University's basketball team completely outplayed Manhattan College's quintet to score a 29-to-7 triumph in the losers' gymnasium last night.

Improving as the game progressed, the Violet attack collected ten field goals and nine fouls. N. Y. U. had possession of the ball most of the time and when Manhattan did get a chance to shoot, the Jaspers' attempts to score generally failed. Manhattan registered only two field goals, one in each half. The score at half-time was 11 to 3.

Shuman Makes First Point.

There was no scoring for the first three minutes. Shuman started the Violet on its way to a substantial lead by registering a foul. Nemecek followed with a field goal on a dribble down the side of the court.

A long shot from the left side and a foul, both by Lefft, made it 6 to 0. Again there was a lull in the scoring for about four minutes, then Newblatt broke the monotony by dropping in a field goal from mid-court.

With more than twelve minutes of the first half gone, Kelleher tallied for Manhattan on a field goal from the left side. Newblatt's foul for N. Y. U. made the score 9 to 2 and Keleher retaliated with one for the Jaspers.

The teams went scoreless a third time for a stretch of nearly four minutes before Lefft registered a field basket on a follow-up of Newblatt's try from mid-court, bringing the total to 11 to 3 just before the half ended.

Keber Scores for Losers.

Manhattan collected three points early in the second period on a foul and field goal by Keber, but after that the Jaspers were limited to a lone point, a foul, made by McCormick midway in the period.

High scoring honors were captured by Hal Lefft, N. Y. U. centre, who tossed in five field goals and one foul for 15 points. Jerry Shuman with 5 points and Charlie Nemecek with 6 were also important factors in the Violet's triumph. The line-up:

M. D. Whitman, Tennis Champion of '90s, Advocates Limit of Service to One Ball

The proponents of a change in the playing rules of lawn tennis to limit the service to one ball gained an outstanding advocate yesterday when Malcolm D. Whitman, national champion in 1898, 1899 and 1900, went on record emphatically in favor of the change, to which William Tilden, present titleholder, recently expressed his opposition.

Mr. Whitman's opinion on the proposed change was given yesterday at the Racquet and Tennis Club after he had watched Clarence C. Pell defeat Lord Aberdare in the international racquets matches. In commenting on the marvelous exhibition of serving that Pell had given and how big a factor it was in his victory, Whitman brought out the point that there was a time when two serves were allowed in racquets in the United States, and expressed the belief that the game was much better today, now that the service has been limited to one ball.

A change to one serve would improve lawn tennis, said Whitman, just as much as it improved racquets. Two serves, in his opinion, gave the man who is hand-in too much of an advantage. He could remember, he said, the time when Quincy Shaw, national racquets champion in 1899 and 1901, would serve whole games without giving his opponent a chance to get hand-in. In those days two balls were allowed on service, and he advocated that the same change that was made in racquets be adopted in lawn tennis.

Ruth Centres Interest in New Golf Clubs, But Hints He Will Join Yankees on March 3

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. Feb. 15 (AP).—If the highest salaried hold-out in baseball is worried about the situation in any respect he did not manifest it today in the course of an eighteen-hole tour of the Jungle Club links.

Babe Ruth is more concerned over a tendency to push his wood shots with a new set of clubs he obtained from a Miami Beach professional than he is, apparently, over the failure to sign a contract yet with the New York Yankees.

It is doubtful whether the middle of February, in advance of major league season, has found Ruth in any better physical condition than he is today. He is tanned to an olive brown shade by the Florida sun and plays at least eighteen, usually thirty-six holes of golf daily. His weight is around 222.

"When do you expect to be swinging a bat for the first time?" the Babe was asked.

"March 3," he shot back.

That's the date when the Yankees will romp out for their first workout under the new management of Bob Shawkey.

Bobby Jones Shoots a 63; Gravel on Green Prevents a 62

ATLANTA, Feb. 15 (AP).—Not that there is any doubt about it, but Bobby Jones still swings a wicked driver. He equaled the best score he ever made on the treacherous East Lake course yesterday by turning in a 63, nine under par.

A piece of gravel on the green of the eighteenth hole robbed him of a new course record. His putt was headed directly for the cup when it struck a tiny piece of gravel and rolled to one side. He shot a 30 on the out nine.

Bobby profited by Winter rules, which put the shorter tees into play, but this advantage was offset by the condition of the greens, which became rough after freezing weather this Winter.

Musicant's Field Goal in Last Minute of Play Is Deciding Factor in Triumph.

MAROON'S RALLY IS IN VAIN

Trupin Scores 12 Points for City College, While Weiss Stars for the Losers.

A field goal by Arthur Musicant, veteran guard, in the last minute of play, gave City College a 24-to-23 victory last night over the Fordham University basketball team at the 102d Engineers' Armory.

The Maroons staged a splendid rally in thee second half to overcome City College's 11-to-7 half-time lead and twice forge to the front. But they couldn't hold to the pace they had set in their upward surge, and Musicant's winning goal came on an easy try under the basket after he had filtered through the entire Fordham quintet to shake himself clear of his guard.

The victory marked C. C. N. Y.'s twelfth over Fordham in sixteen games played between the two metropolitan rivals. It was also C. C. N. Y.'s tenth victory in twelve starts this Winter and Fordham's fourth setback in fifteen games.

City College Has Edge.

City College had a big edge over Fordham in floor work, retaining possession of the ball much more than half the time. But Red Weiss's sensational shooting kept the Maroon in the running all the time, the sophomore forward tossing the ball over the heads of the Lavender guards for five field goals and three fouls, a total of thirteen points.

Milton Trupin scored twelve points for C. C. N. Y. on four field goals and as many fouls. The remainder of the scoring for both teams was evenly distributed.

Behind when the second half started Weiss started Fordham away with a looping goal from mid-field. C. C. N. Y.'s first score of the period was a foul shot by Trupin, which made the score 12 to 9 in C. C. N. Y.'s favor.

Later the count mounted to 16 to 11 as a result of two foul tosses by Trupin, but another of Weiss's long throws looped through to cut that lead down to three points.

Maroons Forge to Lead.

Mulligan's score brought Fordham within a point of the Lavender then Weiss dropped one in from mid-field and the Maroons had the lead, 17 to 16. The scoring see-sawed until, finally, Trupin shot a long goal and the score was tied at 21—21.

Hurley returned the lead to Fordham with a successful foul try then Musicant's goal gave City College the lead at 23 to 22.

It was now the Lavender's time to freeze the ball. A double foul was called on Hochman and Weiss. Hochman made good on his try and Weiss duplicated the feat. C. C. N. Y. continued freezing the ball for the remaining 30 seconds.

YALE SIX CONQUERS PRINCETON, 4 TO 2

Palmer's Sensational Shot Near End Breaks 2-2 Tie in Opener of Series.

15TH TRIUMPH IN ROW

Lea Registers in Middle Session After Wild Melee, Equalizing for the Tigers.

ELIS TAKE LEAD AT START

Get Two Goals in Opening Period, Bent Counting 21 Seconds After Game Begins.

By JOSEPH C. NICHOLS.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Feb. 15.—Yale's hockey team, which has set the collegiate sextets a merry pace all season, experienced one of its narrowest escapes at the hands of a hard-fighting Princeton team tonight. The blue-clad warriors emerged victorious by the score of 4 to 2, but not until a crowd of 2,800 was thrilled repeatedly at the prospect of the incomparable Eli aggregation sustaining a most unexpected and unlooked for reversal. It was the opener of the series between the two teams.

The New Haven sextet, which went on the ice the proud holder of a string of fourteen consecutive victories, faced a stubborn and underrated but hard-fighting Tiger team that threatened time and again to disturb the locals' enviable record.

Even the fact that Yale scored its first tally in 21 seconds of play failed to dishearten the Orange and Black stick wielders, who battled their way from behind to tie their rivals at 2—all in the second period.

Princeton Wages Hard Attack.

A solid invulnerable Princeton defense wall frustrated every Yale effort to break the deadlock until well past the middle of the third period. Indeed, so inspired were the Princeton six that they took the aggressive away from Yale more than half the time in an endeavor to break the tie on their own account. They fought hard, but Yale's greater experience and superior strategy came to the aid of the Elis in the end.

Win Palmer, Yale's high scorer, was the one to blast the Tigers' hopes of victory, or at least a tie. For it was the speedy Yale wing who broke the stalemate with a spectacular shot from midrink that flew into the Princeton net with unerring precision.

Palmer's goal came at a dramatic moment, and snapped the tension that held the crowd almost spellbound in anticipation of an upset. His feat gave Yale confidence, and his score was soon followed by one made by Dunbar Bostwick, who sealed the victory for the Elis. But Princeton fought on and precipitated several assaults on the Yale net before the game ended.

Eli Second Team Starts.

Yale sent its second team on the ice at the start, but Princeton was taken unawares with astounding suddenness, nevertheless, when the Blue reserves tallied the first goal in just 21 seconds. The Blue sextet rested briefly after its quickly attained advantage, remaining content to let the visitors assume the aggressive.

Princeton found difficulty penetrating Yale's defense and resorted to long thrusts that Farrel turned aside with ease. The latter was drawn out once when the Orange and Black crept past Yale's guard, but the Blue goalie waged a strong struggle with the Princeton wingman over the puck and managed to avert it from the net.

Nelson relieved Farrel of the puck and skated through the entire Princeton aggregation in the wake of McLennan, ending the journey with a beautifully propelled shot that skimmed past Pennypacker in the Princeton net. The visitors took to the ice with determination following their opponents' sudden tally and precipitated an attack on the Blue defense men that caused the latter to retreat slowly in a futile effort to prevent a Princeton score. Princeton prevailed in the sally, however, and McAlpin gave the Tigers their first goal near the end of the period.

Tigers Smother Yale Drives.

The second session saw the visitors draw up on even terms with the Elis. Yale made a series of long drives at the Orange net in the opening minutes, but Pennypacker rose to the occasion and kept such a vigilant watch over his net that all the local efforts were smothered. The Princeton attack was the same forceful one that was demonstrated at the close of the initial period and it caused Yale no little worry when it got under way again.

From a spirited flurry on mid-ice the Tigers snared the puck and advanced it gradually through sheer persistence, passing the Yale defense by degrees until they were at the mouth of the Blue goal. A Princeton drive, delivered with much force, sent the rubber over the Yale goal to bounce against the backboard, from where it bounded once more into the group of stick wielders.

Farrell saw the puck return and threw himself on the ice to attempt a save, but Lea was quicker and flipped the puck over the prostrate Yale goalie for the tying goal in 13:40. Yale devoted the remainder of the period to charging at the Princeton net, but the Orange and Black defense stood admirably.

Sizer Defends Eli Net.

Sizer went into the net for Yale in the final period and it was not long before he was called upon to repel a Princeton attack. He succeeded in shunting the puck aside and delivered the rubber to Palmer who skated all the way to the Princeton net but could not score. The Orange and Black found itself in a advantageous position soon after when both Palmer and Wilson were banished from the ice on penalties.

Yale froze the puck until their wingmen returned and soon was given a similar advantage when Adams

Lobley and McNiff Star for the Winners—Losers Show Strong Defense at the Start.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 15.—Flashing a brisk offense in the early part of the second half, Pennsylvania tonight defeated Harvard's basketball team, 35 to 19, before 6,000 fans.

The Crimson surprised the Red and Blue by holding it to a 9—4 score at half-time, although Nido made the lone field goal for the Cambridge passers in the first twenty minutes. When Captain Lobley and his teammates got started in the first ten minutes of the second half they swept the visitors aside, pulling away to a 23—6 lead.

Coach Eddie McNichol used almost every player on the Penn squad. McNiff and Lobley each caged three field goals for Penn, while Nido scored two of the Crimson's six.

Pierce, Harvard centre, was ruled out late in the game when he made his fourth personal foul. It was Penn's fifteenth victory in eighteen starts.

Sports of the Times

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

By JOHN KIERAN.

THE hounds of Spring are on Winter's traces when Memphis Bill Terry signs. Bill is never one to rush at the first contract he sees with a gushing fountain pen. Once he held out until the Giants hit Memphis on their homeward tour, and when Bill called around to pay his respects, John J. McGraw made things so chilly that the first baseman went back home to get his skates. But John J. relented and so did Bill. They always do.

Colonel Jacob saw a headline "Koenig Must Go" and was just waxing indignant, when Treasurer Al Brennan pointed out that the reference was to the Republican leader and not to the Yankee infielder. "Ah, a Republican," said the good Colonel. "Well, let him go. We're all Democrats around here."

It can be taken for granted that Babe Ruth didn't meet that rattlesnake by appointment. He hates snakes worse than he hates slow-ball pitchers. If he had known he was to meet a rattlesnake bent on business in Florida, he would have gone to Europe instead.

On the other hand, Uncle Wilbert Robinson views snakes with a friendly eye. "I've seen all kinds," says Uncle Wilbert, "and they never did me any harm."

The Giants were gathered in a Pullman car on a road trip a few years back when a casual visitor pulled some pet snakes out of his pocket. In ten seconds the car was empty except for the visitor and his reptilian pets.

During one of those bygone Yankee-Robin Spring tours Joe Dugan waved a wooden toy snake at Jacques Fournier, and M'sieu Jacques set an unofficial world's record for the standing broad jump.

From all this evidence it is clear that snakes are not popular in baseball circles. Doc Woods, former Yankee trainer, carried a young alligator around the circuit with him, and Ray Francis, once a Yankee left-hander, chaperoned a team of gray rats through a Washington hotel lobby, but snakes—they're low!

Odds and Ends.

The Reds are planning to have the fastest double-play combination in the major leagues with Hughey Critz and Leo Durocher. They seem to have forgotten English and Hornsby of the Cubs, not to mention Thevenow and Thompson of the Phillies and Gelbert and Frisch of the Cardinals.

Frank Frisch thinks that Gelbert will be one of the leading shortstops of the coming campaign. "He's another Jackson," said Frank, and Polo Grounds fans will count that high praise.

Since Connie Mack got that Bok Prize and $10,000 that he didn't expect, the Athletic hold-outs are confident that he won't deprive them of the money they have been expecting. With that windfall, Connie is in a bad spot.

Scouts report that Dusty Cooke will give Sam Byrd a brisk battle for the third berth in the Yankee outfield. It is to be hoped that Manager Shawkey will settle it definitely one way or the other instead of giving them part-time work, depending on the kind of pitching the Yankees are facing. A good man is in there every day, whether the opposing pitcher throws with his right hand or left hand or both.

The good second basemen are fairly divided between the two big leagues, but at third base the Heydler circuit furnishes the main attractions. Pie Traynor, Pinkie Whitney and Freddy Lindstrom are in the National League.

When second basemen are up for discussion, it won't do to overlook Charley Gehringer of the Tigers, who hits up among the league leaders, fields like a streak, and last year led the American League in stolen bases. He's a quiet fellow and escapes notice easily, but the ball players will tell you about him. They know.

Here and There.

Ace Hudkins gave Maxey Rosenbloom the "come-on-in-and-fight" invitation, the gesture made famous by Jack Dempsey in the Chicago debate with Gene Tunney. What Ace really meant was "Please, Maxey, stand still for a minute so that I can hit you a couple."

No one was hurt in that fight because Maxey doesn't hurt when he hits. Hudkins still wants to know where Maxey was all evening.

That light-heavyweight debate isn't settled yet. Slattery is on top, but Rosenbloom and Larry Johnson are planning trouble, and Mickey Walker edged into the circle by walloping Leo Lomski. Furthermore, what's to prevent Tommy Loughran from coming back in through the front door?

That makes five good men and true who are available for light-heavyweight competition, and those fight followers who lament the good old days of Delaney and Berlenbach are sobbing over nothing at all.

It will take more than the knockout over Knute Hansen to hoist Ted Sandwina into a contending position among the prominent heavyweights. Sandwina is another Von Porat. He has plenty of ability, but he lacks the Dempsey spirit. However, the victory over the Melancholy Dane may stir him up and set him going.

Jack Sharkey doesn't seem to be taking either his training or Phil Scott very seriously, which is bad news for those who intend to take in the Miami program. Unless he has a score to pay off or something else to keep him steamed up, the Boston Broadcaster puts up a dull battle.

Sharkey is looking ahead to Schmeling, which recalls that it was with his eye on Tunney that he tossed away the Risko and Heeney decisions. A hard man to figure, this Sharkey. Perhaps they should make him fight in blinkers so that he can see only the man in front of him on any given night.

ITHACA, N. Y., Feb. 15.—Cornell went into a tie with Dartmouth for fourth place in the Eastern intercollegiate basketball race by defeating the visitors, 29 to 28, in the last minute of play tonight.

Dartmouth led by five points at half-time and by ten points with ten minutes left to play, the score being 23 to 13, but Cornell then put on a rally, led by Lewis and Zahn, that tied the score at 26—26.

Cornell started strongly, running up a five-point lead early in the game, 9—4, but the Indians, led by Picken, Burch and Kramer, got a string of field goals, mostly on long shots, that gave them a 17—12 lead at the half.

ASSOCIATION RULE INVOKED

Tigers' 43-19 Victory Nullified by Regulation—Moles Equals Own Breast-Stroke Record.

Special to The New York Times.

A few days ago the Tigers were forced to abandon water polo for the remainder of the season because of illness to the majority of the players, and consequently Princeton canceled water polo competition for the rest of the season.

MOAKLEY CRITICIZES DIET FOR ATHLETES

Cornell Track Coach, in P. S. A. L. Talk, Opposes the Use of Chopped Raw Meat.

The chopped raw-meat diet for athletes advocated by Lawson Robertson, University of Pennsylvania track and field coach, was strongly criticized by Jack Moakley, veteran coach at Cornell, as unhealthy in an address to a large group of physical training instructors and directors at the Washington Irving High School Auditorium yesterday morning. Another speaker on the program was Henry J. Colbath, track and field coach at Hill School.

The lectures, concerned with "long-distance running" and "the weight events," respectively, were in the series being conducted by the Public Schools Athletic League under the title of the "General Wingate Memorial Lectures." The current group of talks have been arranged by William Stevenson, former Princeton runner.

Although yielding to the point that chopped raw meat may be the finest producer of energy, Mr. Moakley stated that, according to information he had gleaned from competent authorities, meat, unless cooked, may not be thoroughly devoid of injurious bacteria. On this premise, therefore, Mr. Moakley was opposed to the diet.

Included in the talk were many pointers as to methods most successfully used for developing long-distance runners. The speaker added that colleges ought not to engage in too many meets, because it is difficult to keep runners up to peak condition.

Mr. Colbath, in his lecture on the weight events, stressed the fact the most careful attention must be paid to detail. Seventy-five per cent of success is due to form, he contended.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 15.—Speeding merrily through fields of snow, the first expeditionary forces of the Giants, with Eddie Brannick in high command, paused here today in its advance on San Antonio for a few hours of respite and refreshment and also to take on additional enforcements. In the latter group were some fifteen athletes of assorted shapes and sizes, right handed, left handed and ambidextrous, who for the past few days have been mobilizing on the banks of the Mississippi waiting for this momentous occasion.

They were ordered to fall in line by Corporal Brannick, who checked and rechecked them and bundled them aboard the train with instructions not to stray all over the place while locomotives were being changed.

While Brannick was busying himself with his ball players, the correspondents made an effective escape and repaired to the Hotel Jefferson, where they sat down to a luncheon as guests of Sam Breadon, owner of the Cardinals. Four hours of this and the Giant party again was on its way to San Antonio.

In the detachment which reported here were Joe Genewich, Joe Heving, Bill Walker, Lou Allen, Ray Lucas, Roy Parmalee, Ambrose Puttnam, Jim Tennant, Hubert Pruett, William Powley, Lou Wiener, Joe Visotski, Otto Schmidt, Mike Gallagher and Jim McWilliams.

This group, added to Hogan, Clark, Healey, McGee and Hensel, who had boarded the train in New York, brought the Giant party up to twenty. The squad is due to arrive in San Antonio tomorrow night.

World's Open Squash Tennis Title Captured for Fourth Time by Frank Ward

WARD AGAIN TAKES OPEN SQUASH TITLE

City A. C. Professional Annexes World's Crown Fourth Time by Defeating Dufton.

ALLOWS RIVAL FIVE POINTS

Victor, Displaying Amazing Power and Versatility, Wins by 15-2, 15-0, 15-3.

By LINCOLN A. WERDEN.

In nineteen minutes of cyclonic play, Frank Ward of the City Athletic Club, who made his début in squash tennis in 1926, won the world's open championship yesterday afternoon for the fourth time. Giving a great exhibition of shot making, Ward triumphed with the loss of only five points in the three games, defeating Rowland Dufton of the New York A. C. by 15-2, 15-0, 15-3.

A crowd that filled the gallery of the Fraternity Club court completely and which was still being augmented when the match was almost over, watched the City A. C. professional compile an amazing lead by his marvelous all-round play. Smashing with tremendous power and keeping the ball flying around the walls, Ward ran his score to 10-0 in the first and third games before his opponent was able to halt the rush.

Shows Versatile Attack.

Dufton could not stop Ward in the second game at all, being forced to a number of errors by the defending titleholder's diversified attack, which was frequently interspersed with a change of pace. Ward, however, scored point after point only because he was able to get hold of the ball from all angles, while his powerful backhand and front-to-rear-wall play completely overcame Dufton.

Maintaining a furious pace, Ward scarcely lost the service six times in each game, so relentlessly did he wage the battle. Dufton had his chief errors in playing the ball from the rear wall. After he had picked up three points almost at the conclusion of the third game, Dufton, with the score 14-3 against him, brought the whirlwind exhibition to a close by hitting into the tell-tale.

Reaches New Heights.

Ward, who has had a monopoly on the open squash tennis crown during the last five years, and since he won the first year he competed, reached new heights in his court career yesterday by his easy victory. Ward triumphed for the third successive time in 1928 when the last championship was held.

Among those who greeted the champion at the conclusion of the match was Walter Kinsella, the Fraternity Club professional, who was responsible for Ward's learning the game and who, Ward said upon receiving the coach's good wishes again, "taught me all I know about the game."

MIXSELL IN FINAL OF SENIOR SQUASH

Defending Champion Pats Out Ball in Semi-Final—Lee Also Victor.

Harold R. Mixsell, veteran Princeton Club player and defending champion, and W. Murray Lee, Columbia University Club, gained the final in the national senior squash tennis championship by winning their semi-final round matches with apparent ease on the Columbia University Club courts yesterday. Mixsell and Lee will meet for the title at 5:15 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

A well-filled gallery saw Mixsell eliminate Charles M. Bull Jr. of the Crescent A. C. by 15—6, 15—11, and Lee turn back Frederick S. Keeler, Columbia University Club, even more decisive fashion, winning, 15—1, 15—2.

Mixsell's change of pace and superior steadiness were too much for Bull. The champion held the upper hand through the first game and was never extended. In the second game, however, Bull braced considerably and played on even terms with his rival during the early part. It was nip and tuck until the score reached 9-all. Then Bull began to tire and Mixsell bore down to run out quickly.

Lee had things all his way in the match with Keeler, who is several years his senior. From the start, it was a one-sided affair with Keeler playing a strong defensive game, but not well enough to halt Lee. The latter breezed through the initial game, allowing his rival only one point, and yielded only two in the second.

Pittenger, who performed at both shortstop and second base for Cincinnati, will probably be sent to either Jersey City in the International League or to Oakland in the Pacific Coast League.

Etchebaster to Defend Title Against Kinsella in Europe

Pierre Etchebaster, world's court tennis champion, will defend his title against Walter Kinsella of New York, former American professional champion, in a match to be played in three blocks in May either in London or Paris.

Etchebaster, who is maitre-paumier at the Jeu de Paume in Paris, is now coaching at the Racquet and Tennis Club in New York, having obtained a three months' leave of absence to come here. Kinsella, because of the difference in the French court and the ball, desires to play the match in London, while Etchebaster wishes to play in Paris.

The National Class B squash tennis championship started yesterday at the Park Avenue Squash Club and while there were plenty of exciting matches, no particular upsets were recorded though the outcome of at least two matches furnished something of a surprise. Hervey advanced from the first round on a default.

U. S. TAKES SERIES FOR RACQUETS CUP

By ALLISON DANZIG.

unable to even start for the ball. The velocity with which it traveled and the lowness of the trajectory, together with the skill with which Pell concealed the direction of the ball and straightened it out close along the side walls, made it absolutely hopeless to stay his hand.

Lord Aberdare fought courageously and his smile was always in evidence, but there was nothing he could do but accept the fate that was engulfing him. It is doubtful if any player in the world, with the exception of Charles Williams, the world's champion, and Jock Soutar, former world's champion, both professionals, could have coped with the game of racquets that Pell played in this match.

Only a little less impressive was the exhibition of Mortimer in defeating Kemp-Welch. When the national champion of 1916, 1923 and 1926 is at his best he can hold his own with any amateur in the world, and he was right on top of his game yesterday. Kemp-Welch hits a terrifically fast ball, particularly off his backhand, and his service leaves little to be desired, but for the most part he was almost as much at the mercy of Mortimer as Lord Aberdare was against Pell.

Mortimer Uses All Assets.

With one of the finest physiques in the game, a splendid service and dynamite in both his backhand and forehand, Mortimer has everything to make a championship game, and he utilized all his assets to the utmost in this match. His shots came off the front wall with such fearful speed that Kemp-Welch, for all his agility, was unable to keep within proximity, and Mortimer played his strokes so headily that it was impossible for his opponent to close up the gaps and maintain position. Once an opening is given in racquets the point is lost. Mortimer's footwork, too, was a big asset, and the grace and ease with which he covered the court, unusual for a man of his size, was a treat to watch.

Kemp-Welch made a close fight for a part of the opening game, in which he stayed on even terms to 8—all. But from there on the match developed into a procession for the American, with Mortimer serving more and more irresistably and raking the side walls with hard, low drives that hit just above the board.

The members of both teams will leave today or tonight for Boston, where tomorrow the national amateur championship will get under way at the Tennis and Racquet Club, with Henry C. Clark in charge. Huntington D. Sheldon, the holding champion, who was kept out of the international matches with an injured back, left for Boston yesterday.

THE SUMMARIES.

Clarence C. Pell, United States, defeated Lord Aberdare, 15—2, 15—1, 15—3; Stanley G. Mortimer, United States, defeated Peter Kemp-Welch, 15—10, 15—6, 15—3; Hewitt Morgan, United States, defeated Dr. H. W. Leatham, 17—14, 8—15, 3—15, 15—11, 18—16; E. M. Edwards, United States, defeated Duncan, Cambridge, 4—15, 15—7, 15—6, 8—15, 15—1.

L. SPENCE SCORES IN BROOKLYN SWIM

Wins 220-Yard Senior Breast-Stroke in 2:49 2-5 in Y. M. C. A. Water Carnival.

COLLINS, BOYS CLUB, VICTOR

Takes Met. Junior Backstroke Title—Miss Frontero First in Junior Free Style.

Leonard Spence, who amazed by winning the metropolitan A. A. U. junior 220-yard breast stroke championship in close to world's record time in the first open race of his career on Friday, achieved a greater feat at a water carnival in the seventy-five foot pool of the Brooklyn Central Y. M. C. A. last night.

Young Spence scored a clean-cut victory in the senior breast stroke classic at the same distance and against displayed striking speed, gaining the verdict in 2:49 2-5. The international record for seventy-five-foot pools is listed to the credit of Walter Spence at 2:48 and the latter also holds the claimed standard of 2:47 3-5, still unaccepted. Leonard swam unattached.

John Rae Finishes Second.

John Rae of the New York A. C. and Columbia University, also entered unattached, finished second to Spence, five yards back, yet he returned 2:52, a faster mark than earned second place in the senior national event last year. Moe Kirschbaum of the Boys' Club touched ten yeards behind Rae and was third.

Wallace Spence, former holder of the title, was a contender in the elimination heats. There were two—but he did not start in the final.

Large Field Competes.

The metropolitan junior 150-yard back-stroke championship brought out a large field and required four heats. In the deciding trial Charles Collins of the Boys' Club defeated by half a yard Carl Willer of Central, while John Dryfuss of the New York A. C. was a close third. Collins was caught in 1:52 1-5.

Mrs. Carmela Frontero of the Bayville A. C. easily captured the junior 500-yard free style title swim of the district from four rivals. She covered the course in 7:48 2-5 and reached the line ten yards ahead of Miss Evelyn Fogler of the Women's S. A., who secured the place by five yards from Miss Bessie Gray of the Yonkers A. C.

HIGGINSON WINS AT N. Y. A. C. TRAPS

Breaks 99 Out of 100 to Beat Stevens, With 98, for the High Scratch Cup.

HUNT LEADS NASSAU FIELD

Gets 98, While Mangan Annexes Handicap Trophy in Shoot-Off—Other Shooting Results.

B. M. Higginson did some excellent shooting at the Travers Island traps of the New York Athletic Club yesterday, breaking 99 out of 100 targets to win the high scratch cup. The second cup went to F. P. Stevens, who had 98. Higginson, also, was credited with a leg on the Simmons Season Scratch Cup.

Seventeen gunners tied for the handicap cup, each with a full score of 100. B. L. Duke won the shoot-off. Then came J. J. Corkery and G. A. Wylie.

It was announced that Tracy H. Lewis was the winner of the high scratch cup in the shoot at Travers Island on Feb. 9. Lewis had 95 out of a possible 100 targets. The victory had been credited to Thomas H. Lawrence, who had 92. The similarity in the initials of the two gunners was responsible for the error.

Holders of Trophy Two Years Ago Eliminated by Pawtucket in U. S. F. A. Play.

BEST STARS FOR VICTORS

Scores All Three Goals, Nelson and Carlson Tallying for Losers—4,000 See Game.

PAWTUCKET, R. I., Feb. 15.—After a hard battle with Pawtucket, in which the visitors had most of the play but at the end were minus one goal, the New York Nationals, playing their first game in two years in the National Challenge Cup competition of the United States Football Association today, were eliminated by the home team by the score of 3 goals to 2.

Besides doing most of the pressing, the Nationals, getting three in the first half and two in the second, had a tally of five corners to none for their conquerors. Pawtucket was leading at half time by 2—1.

Best, centre forward for the winners, was the star inasmuch as he turned in all three of the goals for his side. Nelson and Carlson tallied in behalf of the Nationals. The field was muddy. A crowd of 4,000 fans turned out to cheer Pawtucket.

HUNTER MILE TO CONGER

Victory Retires Trophy From Competition—Harvard Defeats Yale in Mile Relay.

BOSTON, Feb. 15 (AP).—Eddie Blake, who wore a Dartmouth track uniform before he donned the Boston A. A. colors, provided one of the biggest upsets of the current indoor track season tonight by beating Phil Edwards, New York University's great runner, to the tape by a yard in the 600-yard run, one of the features of the forty-first annual B. A. A. track and relay games.

Edwards, running for the Olympic Club of Hamilton, Ont., got off to a poor start in the seven-man race. His long strides carried him past everybody except Blacke, who fought him off with desperate fury on the backstretch. Fred Veit of the New York A. C. was just a few inches behind Edwards at the tape. Blake's time was 1:14 4-10.

Though pressed by R. A. Dalrymple of the B. A. A., Ray Conger, the Illinois A. C.'s great miler, won the Hunter mile in 4:22 2-10, retiring the famous trophy from competition. Conger won this race last year and Joie Ray gave the Illinois Club its first leg several seasons ago.

The Harvard-Yale mile relay clash was a glorious battle until the final leg when F. B. Tuttle, the Blue's anchor, dropped the baton. Charlie Nagle had jumped into a yard lead on his third leg, overtaking Eddie Record, who had received a two-yard start by the first pair of Harvard runners. While Tuttle fumbled about for the stick, Munroe, the Crimson anchor swept past him and piled up a 15-yard margin during his three turns about the track. The Harvard time was 3:26 8-10.

Fred Sturdy, former Yale pole-vaulter, now competing for the Los Angeles A. C., won his event by clearing 13 feet 7 inches. Monty Wells, former Dartmouth hurdler and national indoor champion, won the 45-yard high hurdle event for the fourth consecutive time.

Jimmy Daley, Holy Cross flier, beat Chet Bowman of the Newark A. C. to the tape by two yards in the 40-yard dash final. F. V. Nisson of Harvard placed third, a yard behind Bowman. Daley's time was 0:04 6-10.

Charlie Thompson of the New York Central A. A. provided the first upset of the meet by spurting wildly on the last lap of the 1,000-yard run and barely beating Charley Sansone of the B. A. A. to the tape in 2:19 2-10. Harold Cutbill of the Millrose A. A. wobbled badly on the last turn, but managed to stay in front of Sam Martin of the B. A. A., last year's winner, who was making his first start of this indoor season, and take third.

Joe Hagen of Columbia, intercollegiate indoor two-mile champion, had little competition in winning his favorite event in 9:33. There were but three of the seven starters in the race when Hagen started on his twenty-fourth and last lap. He had almost a half-lap lead on Harry Richardson, Maine cross-country star, when he broke the tape. Bernie Estes of Harvard finished third. Russell Jellison of the B. A. A. threatened to give Hagen a race until he fell on a corner about half-way through the race.

Simpson Bows in 40-Yard Dash to Ford at Northwestern Meet

EVANSTON, Ill., Feb. 15 (AP).—George Simpson, Ohio State's sensational sprinter, suffered defeat tonight in the annual quadrangular meet at Northwestern University, losing the 40-yard dash to Jo Ford, an almost unknown Northwestern sprinter. Ford's time was 0:04 3-5. Ford not only nipped Simpson by a foot in the final, but also defeated him in a qualifying heat.

WORLD'S RECORD SET BY ELDER IN DASH

By ARTHUR J. DALEY.

months a nationally known figure. His mad gallop of 96 yards for a touchdown against Army on the frost-bitten turf of the Yankee Stadium last November terminated his football course, and his record performance last night fittingly brought to a triumphant finish his track career.

New York A. C. Displaced.

Almost equally surprising as Elder's record feat was the displacing of the New York A. C., perennial metropolitan team champion, by Coach Emil von Elling's New York University intercollegiate indoor championship combination. Deprived of the services of Phil Edwards and Hitch Griffith, who turned in two triumphs for the Violet last year, N. Y. U. garnered 30 points to interrupt the Winged Foot reign which had extended unchallenged since the war.

Coach Bernie Wefer's pupils, not quite as numerous as in former years, rolled up 21 points for second honors while Carl Anderson's Newark A. C. team was third with 13. Unattached athletes scored 17.

The Violet won by pushing in seconds, thirds and fourths and gaining only two first places. The N. Y. U. captain, Sol Furth, was the chief contributor by winning the 70-yard low hurdles, taking second in the standing high jump and running the 220-yard leg on the victorious medley relay team.

That winning N. Y. U. relay combination was one of three defending champions to break through with victories. Except for this relay success, the only repeaters were T. S. Clark of the New York A. C., in the standing high jump, and William Werner of the Greendwood Track Club, in the standing broad jump. Clark had a battle on his hands to retain his laurels, the irrepressible Furth tying him for first place only to lose on a jump-off.

Annexes Another Crown.

Dr. Paul Martin, the national champion of Switzerland, added a metropolitan title to the numerous crowns he has garnered in the past twelve seasons by annexing the 1,000-yard championship in easy fashion.

Frequently looking behind him to locate the whereabouts of his nearest competitors, the hard-running European athlete, competing in the colors of the New York A. C., raced the rest of the field into the ground to win by twenty yards in the fine time of 2:17 2-10.

For just a first few laps there was slight room for doubt as to whether the Swiss surgeon would be able to conquer his adversaries. He was buried in the pack at the start, but gradually worked his way to second position behind Walter Gassner of N. Y. U. Still he lagged behind for several circuits. But just before the half-way mark Dr. Martin shot past Gassner and was heading the parade. He gained with every stride despite the fact that he insisted on casting hasty glances over his shoulder. On he came with his head rolling from side to side, in the style he affects, and never desisted in his headlong flight to the wire.

In winning Dr. Martin became a worthy successor to Phil Edwards, who let his local crown go by default. In view of the fact that he was not particularly pressed his time compares favorably with Edwards's winning efforts in the past.

Fine Race by Roll.

Another excellent performance was turned in by Eddie Roll of the Newark A. C., winner of the Millrose 600 a week ago, who turned in his fourth consecutive victory by taking the 600-yard crown in the tidy time of 1:14 6-10, even better than his winning effort over the faster Garden track last week.

Coming just one-sixteenth of an inch away from his record schoolboy leap of 6 feet 3 1-6 inches, with which he won the P. S. A. L. high jump crown, George Spitz propelled himself over the bar at 6 feet 3 inches to capture his fifth championship in eight months. Spitz now holds P. S. A. L. indoor and outdoor championships, metropolitan senior indoor and outdoor crowns and metropolitan junior outdoor laurels.

Joe McCluskey, Fordham freshman star, shook off the determined pursuit of Frank Bayley of the New York A. C. to win the two-mile title, relinquished by Gus Moore of the Brooklyn Harriers. McCluskey, running in last place for more than a mile, sped to the front about ten laps from the finish and then conquered Bayley by twenty-five yards after unleashing a sizzling last lap sprint. McCluskey was timed in 9:33 8-10.

McCluskey was not the only freshman to triumph, as A. Niles Schoening of Columbia battered his way to the front in the 60-yard dash to win by inches in the good time of 0:06 6-0.

THE SUMMARIES.

FOUR GAIN TITLES IN BOSTON GAMES

White, Wesley, McCrudden, McDonough Win New England A. A. U. Championships.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Feb. 15.—Four New England A. A. U. indoor track championships were decided at the forty-first annual Boston A. A. interscholastic track meet, held at the Arena this afternoon. R. E. White, University of Maine, won the forty-yard dash. White finished second in a trial heat, but triumphed in the final.

The 1,000-yard run was the best of the championship races, with Richard Wesley of New York, a Harvard cross-country and track star, finishing in front by an inch. He was way in the rear at the gun lap, and with about thirty yards to go he came up from fifth position to win.

The other titles were won by James McCrudden of Northeastern in the 600-yard run and Thomas McDonaugh, B. A. A., in the two-mile run.

For the first time in many years the track teams of Exeter and Andover were not represented, and the meet was closely fought, Worcester Academy, as was expected, winning with 15⅝ points. Huntington School of Boston was second with 11⅝, followed by Moses Brown School of Providence with 10. Newark Prep and Lawrence High School were tied for fourth place with 8 points. La Salle School of Rhode Island finished fifth with 7¾ points.

Newark Prep, which came close to winning the meet two years ago and won last year, had a relay team entered which broke the existing record for the three-lap, or three-quarter-mile, mark by fourteen seconds, running the distance in 3:13.

CAPO BEATS WEBER AT ST. AUGUSTINE

Florida Golfer Captures Final of St. Valentine's Tourney by 3 and 1.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. AUGUSTINE, Fla., Feb. 15.—The veteran Harold Weber of Toledo, five times holder of the Ohio State amateur golf championship, was defeated today by Joe Capo, a local star, in the 36-hole final of the fourteenth annual St. Valentine's tournament.

Weber suddenly lost control of his drives on the last nine holes and was beaten, 3 and 1. The defeat deprived Weber of permanent possession of the William R. Kenan Jr. cup, while it gave Capo his second leg on the trophy.

Shooting even 4's for the morning round, Weber was 2 up going to luncheon. On the first nine in the afternoon Capo stroked his way out in 34, two shots under par, and they went into the final nine all square. Then Weber's game went to pieces.

On the tenth he drove into the woods, and his second hit a bunker. Weber three-putted the twelfth, and on the next he missed his second shot and then used three more putts.

On the fourteenth his drive found the woods once more. Capo also was in the woods here, and took two shots to get out. Capo's approach was short on the fifteenth, but Weber was in the rough again near the sixteenth green. An easy 4 on the seventeenth gave Capo the victory as Weber sent his second into a trap.

GAINS LEAD AT 5TH HOLE

Victor Increases Margin Over Buffalo Player and Stands 6 Up at the 27th.

Special to The New York Times.

CORAL GABLES, Fla., Feb. 15.—Registering his second tournament victory of the Winter season, Howard A. Tryon of Elmira, N. Y., won the Miami-Biltmore invitation event by taking the thirty-six-hole final today from Jack Ahern of Buffalo. The Elmira lad, who recently became national champion of club champions at St. Augustine, scored by 8 and 6, taking the lead on the fifth hole and increasing the advantage as the match progressed.

Ahern held his young rival on the first nine, being only 1 down at the turn after winning the third hole with a par 3 to assume the lead. Ahern squared this with an eagle 3 on the tenth, sinking a fifteen-foot putt to place him in the running again, but after that he missed many short putts. The Buffalo player was 3 down at the completion of the morning round.

Tryon continued his steady play in the afternoon round, boosting his margin to 6 up at the end of twenty-seven holes. Ahern was spectacular with his chip shots, but he took three putts on nine greens of the twelve holes played in the afternoon.

BARRON-MEHLHORN TIE FOR GOLF LEAD

New York Pros Score 143 Each to Top Field in Pensacola Oepn Tournament.

RAIN DRENCHES THE LINKS

Sarazen, Winner of Agua Caliente Prize, Starts Superbly, but Falters to Tie for 7th.

Special to The New York Times.

PENSACOLA, Fla., Feb. 15.—Eight professional golfers, all well-known players, were in the vanguard of the second annual Greater Pensacola open tournament, the first thirty-six holes of which were played today through a cold rain at the Pensacola Country Club course.

Leading the field with totals of 143 were two New York pros, Herman Barron of the Tamarack Country Club, Port Chester, N. Y., and Wild Bill Mehlhorn, formerly playing professional at the Fenimore Country Club at White Plains, now competing unattached.

Mehlhorn tied for the lead in the storm this morning with a 70 and he scored a 73 over the wet course this afternoon after starting with a 7. Barron scored a 74 and 69. Whiffy Cox of Brooklyn also tallied 69 this afternoon for an all-day aggregate of 144, putting him only one shot behind the pace-setters.

Cooper's Cards Creditable.

Three nationally known pros, Al Espinosa, Johnny Farrell and Harry Cooper, tied at 145. Farrell had 71 under the unfavorable conditions prevailing this morning, and he did well to score a 74 this afternoon after starting with a 6.

Cooper had two creditable cards of 73 and 72, both made under the handicap of poor putting. Espinosa, who has finished not worse than a tie for fourth in the last four tournaments of the Winter trip, continued his steady golf to score a 73 and a 72.

Tony Manero came in with the third 69 of the afternoon round to tie at 146 with Gene Sarazen, winner of the recent Agua Caliente open. Both are Italian-Americans from the New York district. Sarazen represents the Fresh Meadow Country Club at Flushing, L. I., where the 1930 championship of the P. G. A. of America will be played next September. Manero is an unattached professional who formerly was the playing pro at the Fairview Country Club in Elmsford.

Storm Overtakes Mehlhorn.

No other player in the field totaled better than 148 for the two rounds. Ed Dudley, Ryder Cup team member from Wilmington, Del., was well up with a 71 this morning, but his 78 this afternoon included sixteen putts on five straight greens—four three-putt greens and another on which he required four strokes to hole out.

Mehlhorn's 70 was the best score made in the high wind and driving rain which came down during the first-round play. The storm broke when he was at the sixth hole. The former Fenimore representative went out in 36, a short approach costing him a 6 on the ninth. On the fourteenth Bill bagged a birdie 3 by holing out a roll-up shot with a No. 4 iron from about 125 yards off the green. He had a 4 for a 69 but took a 5 on the last hole when his approach was short and to the right.

In the afternoon Mehlhorn started with a 7 on the 336-yard first hole without ever being off the fairway. He skied his drive, topped two more shots and took three strokes with his putter. A ten-foot putt gave him a birdie on the fifth. He three-putted No. 7 but got home in two for a birdie on No. 9.

Mehlhorn took three putts on the tenth and he was trapped on the sixteenth. A twelve-foot putt on No. 17 enabled him to tie for the lead. This birdie, with a 4 on No. 18, put him back in 34 after taking 39 to the turn.

SIMPSON WILL RUN IN MEET TOMORROW

Brilliant Sprinter to Make New York Debut in N. Y. A. C. Games at Garden.

NOTABLE FIELD FOR EVENTS

Martin, Petkiewicz, Veit, Conger, Bowen Among Many Stars Who Will Be in Action.

By ARTHUR J. DALEY.

The initial competitive appearance in New York of the world's fastest human, George Simpson of Ohio State, will be the magnet that is expected to attract a capacity crowd to Madison Square Garden tomorrow night for the annual New York Athletic Club games, which have returned this year with one of the best programs in recent seasons.

In addition to scoring a ten-strike by obtaining the entry of the Buckeye Bullet for its 60-yard sprints, the Winged Foot committee, headed by Matt Halpin, will present Olympic, international and national stars in seven feature events. The famous Buermeyer 500, the notable Brefney half mile, the classic Baxter mile, an international 5,000-meter duel, the pole vault, the 60-yard high hurdles and the sprints all have attracted athletes far above the average.

The international flavor is lent by the appearance of Dr. Paul Martin of Switzerland and the N. Y. A. C. in the Brefney half and of Stanislaw Petkiewicz of Poland in the 5,000-meter run. In neither event is a foreign victory assured. Far from it.

Martin, second to Doug Lowe in the 1924 Olympic 800-meter final, will be opposed by Phil Edwards of the Hamilton Olympic Club, Fred Veit of the New York A. C., Charlie Thompson of the New York Central A. A., Jack Mara of Georgetown and Harold Cutbill, world's record holder at 1,000 yards. Just a week ago last night Veit conquered Martin in the half-mile at the Millrose games by an infinitesimal margin. So close were they at the finish that both first and second place judges disagreed on the winner and the chief judge swung the balloting in favor of Veit. Martin has beaten Edwards at 1,000 yards, but also has lost to him at the same distance.

Hard Task for Petkiewicz.

As for Petkiewicz, he has a large order in front of him. One of his opponents will be Paul Rekers of Penn State, who vanquished Poland's diplomatic courier at two miles in the fine time of 9:25 2-10 a week ago. The other will be young Joe McCluskey of Fordham, one of the sensations of the current season, a youth fully capable of better than 9:30. However, Petkiewicz is likely to prove better at 5,000 meters (about three miles) than he was at the shorter two-mile route, and a stirring struggle is anticipated.

Ray Conger of the Illinois A. C., undefeated at a mile indoors since 1928, also may have a task on his hands to win from the surprising Gene Venzke of the Swedish-American A. C., who lost by only two yards to Conger's fast 4:20 mile at the Meadowbrook games. Venzke has come along at a rapid rate this season and has enough stamina at the finish to challenge Conger's famous last-lap drive.

The Buermeyer 500 is something of a toss-up with four fast men in the race. Pete Bowen of the University of Pittsburgh, the national and intercollegiate 440-yard champion, has at last mastered indoor running as was evidenced by his superb exhibition against Eddie Roll of the Newark A. C. in the Millrose 600.

Blake Rounding to Form.

Bowen will face Eddie Blake of the Boston A. A., Charlie Engle of Yale, the national 300-yard champion, and Hitch Griffith of the New York A. C., the former metropolitan titleholder, who let his crown go by default last night. Blake came close to 1:12 for the 600 last year and is just starting to round into form. Engle is a 49-second quartermiler, while Griffith, who has devoted most of his energies this year to handicap races, may use his long strides to advantage in battling so small a field.

The pole vaulting competition will be the best of the season. Fred Sturdy of the Los Angeles A. C., national and intercollegiate champion, touched 14 feet in this same event a year ago to become the third man in the history of track to ever reach that height. Tom Warne of Northwestern is the world's indoor record holder from a dirt runway, while big Barney Berlinger of Penn is the top-heavy favorite to suceed Sturdy as the intercollegiate champion at the I. C. A. A. A. A. games at the 102d Engineers Armory on March 1.

Sandy Ford Beaten by Molasses Jane in Murphy Memorial Handicap at Miami

MOLASSES JANE, 5-1, TRIUMPHS AT MIAMI

Defeats Sandy Ford by Half Length in Joseph P. Murphy Memorial Handicap.

CRYSTAL DOMINO IS NEXT

Knight, Up on Victor, Comes From Far Back—Is Signed to Ride by J. E. Widener.

Special to The New York Times.

MIAMI, Fla., Feb. 15.—Jockey Melvin Knight, who rode more winners than any other jockey on the American turf in 1929, added two achievements to his record at Hialeah Park today when he rode the winner of the Joseph P. Murphy Memorial Handicap shortly after the announcement that he had signed a contract to ride for Joseph E. Widener.

Knight brought the Branncastle Farm's Molasses Jane, a 5-to-1 shot, home in front by half a length over Sandy Ford, at 20 to 1, which beat Crystal Domino by four lengths. Ten others trailed, among them being Herrick, joint favorite with the winner, which earned $3,780.

The berth which Knight has secured with the president of the Westchester Racing Association is one of the most desirable in the United States. Earl Sande used to ride for Widener, and last year Willie Garner wore the scarlet and white stripes. Whether Garner is to remain or not was not announced, but there is plenty of room for two jockeys, and it is very likely that Knight will take up his duties alongside of one of the most capable members of that great riding family which has sent four first-class riders to the turf.

Knight Displays Skill.

Knight's ride in the Memorial Handicap certainly was nothing to make Widener regret his decision. Knight got his horse out of trouble after crowding and a jam just after the start and then threaded her through the big field to come from far back in the pack to a contending position in the stretch. After the crowding and before the stretch turn was made, Knight kept Molasses Jane to the inside, finding holes at opportune places.

But once in the stretch, where most horses close over onto the rail, Knight shot to the outside with the Branncastle horse and avoided being shut off. He drove on with nothing to stop him and caught Sandy Ford in the last furlong. This horse of Willie Shea's did not give up without a struggle and was beaten only because Molasses Jane was the better horse.

The winner carried 108 pounds, against 109 for Sandy Ford, and finished the mile and a sixteenth in 1:44 3-5. This time is a fifth of a second slower than the track record. The race was for three-year-olds and upward, and some of the entrants were being given a trial for the Florida Derby, which will be run next month as the high spot of the meeting.

Eight-to-Five Favorite Scores.

The track record in the fifth race, the Perrine Purse, was equaled when Joe Stern's Gun Royal, under the top weight of 119 pounds, raced five furlongs in 0:59. Jack Howe, Gun Royal's arch rival at this meeting, also carried 119 pounds and he finished third, a head behind Mud, which was a length and a half back of Gun Royal's heels. The winner was the 8-to-5 favorite and Jack Howe the 12-to-5 second choice.

Jack Howe and Gun Royal have raced five times each at this meeting and they have opposed each other on three of these times. On both previous occasions Jack Howe was the winner by narrow margins, with Gun Royal a fast-going second. But today Stern's horse turned the tables, even though he had to equal Don Diego's 1927 mark to do it.

Sonny Workman, one of Harry Payne Whitney's contract riders, was up on Gun Royal and Knight was up on Jack Howe. Knight broke his horse on top and kept him there for the first quarter despite the fact that Mud raced at his flank with great determination.

These two swung into the stretch still battling for the lead and with Mud now a nose or so in the lead. Meanwhile Workman rated behind the crackling pace set by these fighters and bided his time.

The chance came in the stretch and Gun Royal responded gamely, passing Mud and Jack Howe in a hard drive. The other two held on gamely and swept over the line still a head apart.

In the nightcap Charles Grayson's Sign Off made it two in a row at this meeting when he won by four lengths over Marlboro.

PAUL BUNYAN FIRST BY LENGTH AND HALF

Scores 6th Victory in 10 Starts by Beating Strongheart at Fair Grounds.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 15.—One of the most consistent records made by a horse this season was continued at the Fair Grounds today when L. M. Severson's Paul Bunyan won the Edgewater Gulf Hotel Handicap and the purse of $2,300.

Since last October the son of Paul Weidel and Audrey Austin has started ten times and triumphed in six of his efforts. Twice he has been second and once third. Paul Bunyan's only poor race was in the New Orleans Handicap, when he finished far back after being made the favorite.

He was the favorite again today, being backed down to 2 to 1 in a field of seven. At the end of the mile and an eighth he was a length and a half ahead of Strongheart from the Walbri Farms, which led the Reuter Stable's Galahad by the same distance. Lord Braedelbane, Star o' Morn, Inception and Thistle Fyrn trailed in the order named.

Jockey L. Martin was the rider of the winner and he also brought home Punkie in the sixth and Keydet in the seventh, thus getting a triple for the day. Jockey C. Landolt scored a double, riding Lightning Jones and Uluniu.

The track was a sloppy one for all of the races and this caused a good many scratches, particularly in the big race. But Paul Bunyan has shown that he can run on any kind of a track and he took to the surface today. Kept back of the pace for the first four furlongs he came on strongly when called on and took the lead. After getting to the front there was none to challenge seriously and he crossed the line under a hand ride.

Strongheart and Galahad were both far back in the early running and each got his part of the purse by a great rush in the last quarter of a mile. Strongheart has won twice before at this meeting while Galahad has scored only one victory in his last ten starts. Lord Braedalbane was well up throughout but tired.

EASTERN DOG SHOW TO OPEN THURSDAY

More Than 1,300, Record Entry, Will Be Benched in Boston Garden Exhibition

NEW YORKERS WILL JUDGE

Many Breeders and Fanciers From This City Will Be in Rings—Strong Airedale Entry.

Second of the great exhibitions in the East to which dog fanciers from all over the country look forward each year, the show of the Eastern Dog Club, will open in the new Garden in Boston on Thursday, to continue through the holiday on Saturday evening. Each of the famous canine events staged at different seasons of the year in various parts of the country has its distinctive characteristics. Westminster, of course, is the leader, where are gathered all of the great specimens, which are viewed by a cosmopolitan crowd. Here meet the breeders and the fanciers from all ends of the canine world.

Boston has an atmosphere of its own. It is not that the fanciers of the Hub are more exclusive or their exhibits more aristocratic; but the capital of the Bay State and home of the codfish has a larger proportion of sportsmen who are interested in hunting dogs—gun dogs and hound type—as compared with the great mass of breeders and fanciers of dogs of different varieties in many other cities.

What other city in the country could put on a two-day spaniel show and draw the best specimens in the land? Spaniels and setters and pointers always are very strong at the Boston event, and it is a fact that many of the New England sportsmen consider it just as great an honor to go to the top of their home show as at New York. Some of them reserve practically their whole strings for the local event rather than take chances of illness or accident at Westminster.

So it is that this week's Eastern Dog Club event, upon which President T. Dixon Smith and his associates on the executive and bench show committees have expended a great deal of time and anxious thought, will be one of the most interesting exhibitions of the whole canine season. It should not be thought, however, that this show will have a preponderance of sporting types, since the entry is very well balanced, fanciers in all the popular breeds having supported the exhibition liberally.

Record Attendance Expected.

More than 1,300 dogs will be benched at Boston, the largest entry in the Eastern's history of eighteen years. There is every reason to believe, too, that—as was the case last week at Westminster—the dogs will attract a record attendance.

In the Boston Garden there is the especial advantage of having the exhibition hall, where the dogs are benched, on the same level with the judging arena. Here there is almost unlimited room and it is open on all sides to light and air—a desideratum in any similar display of animal life. It is especially convenient for the handlers in getting their charges to and from the judging rings.

Many of the champions of the Westminster Club's exhibition have been withheld from the smaller circuit intervening between the two canine classics that they may be "in the pink" for the battles to be fought out again in Boston under somewhat different auspices. While the Eastern Dog Club officials have made their selections of judges from among American talent, the board is unusually strong.

Many New York breeders and fanciers will be among the judges in the Boston rings. Selwyn Harris of this city and Frank H. Addyman of Ardsley will be the all-arounders. Harold Ober of Scarsdale, N. Y., will need be at his best to sort out the Airedales. Boston is an Airedale stronghold and Mr. Ober will have the best dogs that competed in the recent specialty show here and at Westminster to look over, with a few additions that have been held in reserve.

Bixby and Lord Among Judges.

Henry D. Bixby of Huntington, L. I., will have the Cairns, Scotties and West Highland whites to judge, with a fine entry in all three breeds. Fox terrier men everywhere have the profoundest respect for the judgment of Franklin B. Lord of Syosset, L. I., in the matter of wire-haired fox terriers and the fanciers will have the results of the judging of three notable experts—one of them from England—to talk over after he finishes.

Mrs. Haley Fiske of Bernardsville, N. J., is going up to Boston to look over the greyhounds and the sporting spaniels—except the springers, which will come under Donald N. Fordyce of Allentown, Pa., who will also do the Gordon setters. These breeds will take a lot of judging at Boston and they have judges who may be relied upon to do the job thoroughly.

The Newfoundland for generations has had a warm spot beside New England firesides and it should not be forgotten that it was a Massachusetts dog—the bitch Shelton Atalonta, owned by Robert R. Ames, representative of one of the oldest of New England families—that Harold MacPherson of St. John's, Newfoundland, adjudged best of breed at Westminster. D. C. Williams of Jordan, N. Y., will judge this noble old breed this week.

Miss Elsie Blum of Elmhurst, L. I., will go over to pass on the Pomeranians, and while Mrs. Vincent Matta of Astoria, L. I., will not be showing under her intimate friend, Miss Blum will have a fine entry to judge. Pekingese, most popular of all the toys at the moment, will have some of the best in the country for Selwyn Harris to judge. Sealyhams were impressive at Madison Square Garden and W. Ross Proctor Jr. of this city will judge them at Boston. Mr. Glynn found the best here in Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Brown's much improved Delf Discriminate of Pinegrade. There will be a lot of good Sealys at Boston.

JOCKEY IN SERIOUS SHAPE.

Bullman Was Injured by Fall From Mount at Miami Track.

MIAMI, Fla., Feb. 15 (AP).—Spencer Bullman, who was injured when thrown from Princess Bonnie in the fifth race at Hialeah Park yesterday, was in a serious condition today. An examination showed he had fractured the pelvic bone in four places.

Gilman's Outstanding Cocker Spaniel Takes Laurels in Bird Dog Division.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Feb. 15.—Best-in-show among more than 800 dogs that were judged in the eleventh annual dog show of the Elm City Kennel Club today for the benefit of the Connecticut Women's League for Animals was Whitecroft Reflex of Croydon, the wire-haired fox terrier owned by the Croydon Kennels of Greenwich, Conn.

An enthusiastic gathering of New England fanciers crowded the Meadow Street Armory in spite of a heavy snowstorm, remaining until the final award was made at a late hour.

In the judging of the variety groups, Grover C. Rauch selected that outstanding cocker spaniel, Idahurst Belle II, owned by O. B. Gilman of Boston, which was best of the Boston and New York specialty shows, as the best of the bird dog division of the sporting dog group.

Mrs. Florence B. Ilch of Red Bank, N. J., gained further honors with her lovely collie, Lucason of Ashtead O'Bellhaven, by winning best of the working dog group.

Dual Boxing Meets Outdrew Football Games at Virginia

Boxing is proving extremely popular at the University of Virginia and two recent boxing matches drew larger crowds to the Memorial Gymnasium than those which attended two of the football games on Lambeth Field last Fall.

The match between Virginia and Florida attracted about 3,000 persons and nearly 4,000 were present at the ring duels with North Carolina. Both of the varsity meets were preceded by first-year bouts which helped to increase the crowd. Last season gridiron contests with Randolph-Macon and with St. John's of Annapolis were attended by smaller crowds than the boxing events drew.

LISTERINE ANNEXES FEATURE AT HAVANA

Carries Palmer's Silks Home First in Impressive Style in Josefita Purse.

PATSY H. FINISHES SECOND

Outruns Field Early but Tires at the Close—Treacle Strong at End to Be Third.

HAVANA, Feb. 15 (AP).—H. T. Palmer's Listerine, ridden by H. Kenly, accounted for the Josefita Purse, which was offered as the feature attraction at Oriental Park today. The victory came in clever fashion over H. W. Miller's Patsy H., with Treacle third. The event was over the short sprinting distance and a field of nine started.

Patsy H. rushed into command at once and outran the field in the first furlong. Nearing the far turn she was joined by Ella Bank, Domineer and Listerine. The latter was on the outside and under restraint. Turning from home the pacemakers began to falter and Kenly then moved up with Listerine. The mare responded courageously, closing fast to wear down Patsy H., and drawing away at the end.

Patsy H. had a safe advantage over Treacle, which saved much ground during the early running, but was forced to come to the outside in the stretch to secure racing room. She finished fast and was a good third.

TEST FOR WOMEN RIDERS.

Coronado Town Plate Will Be Run at Agua Caliente Today.

The third renewal of the Coronado Town Plate will be run at Agua Caliente this afternoon. The race is exclusively for women riders and has been patterned somewhat after the Newmarket Town Plate. This test once was open to both men and women but now only women ride.

The Mexican test is over the six-furlong distance and it is expected that there will be as interesting a contest as in other years when close finishes have resulted. Last year Miss Peggy Childs was the winner with Willow Bramble. Miss Ardeth Schneider piloted Holly Boy to win the first running of the race.

In addition to women riders the judges and starters will be women and even the rider of the lead pony will be a woman. Mrs. Vera Crofton, wife of James N. Crofton, general manager, is expected to be one of the entrants. Mrs. Crofton is known on the Coast as a horsewoman of ability.

FREIGHT DELIVERY BY CARRIERS URGED

G. F. Hichborn Advocates Plan for Prompt Removal of Shipments From Piers.

SEES LACK OF FACILITIES

And Declares City Has Not Gone Forward in 15 Years in Solution of One Transportation Problem.

Delivery of freight at Manhattan piers which has resulted from the lack of public team tracks should be eliminated and store-door delivery substituted as the opening wedge to a national delivery system, in the opinion of George F. Hichborn, general traffic manager of the United States Rubber Company and former president of the Traffic Club of New York City.

In an address before 300 members of the club, including vice presidents and traffic managers of the trunk line railroads, Mr. Hichborn described the progress in England, where the railroads have organized their own delivery service, and the operation of the Columbia Terminals Company of St. Louis, a private corporation, as examples of methods which should be used in New York.

New York is today where it was fifteen years ago, when the study of its freight delivery problem was started, he said. Recalling an address he delivered in 1917, in which he said there was a pressing need in Manhattan for prompt removal of freight from congested piers and the cutting down of the waiting time of trucks to load and unload at piers, Mr. Hichborn said the principles involved are as pertinent today as they were then, though they are not the controlling factors.

Predicts New System Within Year.

Direct delivery and pick-up service will be in operation in Manhattan within the year, he predicted, and will do much in solving the freight problem of New York. This system was almost put into effect in 1918 after a survey, but the end of the war caused a readjustment and the plan was abandoned, he said. The problem, as viewed by Mr. Hichborn and his proposal for finding its solution was expressed as follows:

"We all recognize that the geographic and other conditions in the metropolitan district of New York with its 8,000,000 of people differ materially from those of any other distribution center elsewhere. This is particularly true of Manhattan Island. The public team tracks of the carriers, in comparison with the requirements of the community, are inconsiderable in number and inadequate in capacity, and there are relatively few spur or side tracks leading to warehouses, factories and industries.

"This is due to the fact that Manhattan is an island; its real estate values are very high; the streets have long been laid out and are closely built up with costly structures. There is no available room for additional yards, team and spur tracks, and other rail facilities. The result of these limitations is that practically all carload package freight must be handled by car float to and from the piers.

"The lack of sufficient public team tracks [illegible] the New York Central to resort very largely to pier deliveries. And the piers, at least in the lower end of Manhattan Island, cannot be multiplied in number nor are they capable of much enlargement. Moreover, both carload and less than carload consignments, inbound and outbound, are usually handled on the same pier.

"The consequences of such conditions are serious, not alone to the business interests of Manhattan but to shippers throughout the country having traffic destined to New York, or which must move through the port to points beyond, or to ship's side, for export."

The operation of so-called constructive stations on Manhattan Island and trucking in lieu of lighterage throughout New York district served for several years prior to Sept. 25, 1929, as the means of delivery but the Interstate Commerce Commission finally ordered the railroads to cancel their delivery tariffs and there is no longer a railroad pick-up or delivery service in any part of Greater New York. Mr. Hichborn suggests that the metropolitan district below Sixtieth Street be used as a testing ground for such service to be operated by the carriers as a carrier service under a special drayage charge fixed in their tariffs.

The carriers now own and operate the Railway Express Agency, Inc., and could easily bring its large fleet of trucks and its trained personnel into effective operation in a national delivery service, said Mr. Hichborn.

"This service," he said, "may be optional on carloads and it should be optional on less-than-carloads only until such time as the service is definitely and successfully established. After that it should be compulsory on inbound freight unless delivered through a universal inland station and so consigned by the shipper. Outbound freight should be picked up by trucks in the service, or if handled by shippers' trucks should be delivered to a universal inland station.

"Such an arrangement as this would eventually eliminate pier stations and incidentally relieve consignees or their truckmen of a loading expense. It will also release piers for use of transatlantic and coastwise passenger service. On freight handled in direct pick-up and delivery service the carrier must assume full responsibility to and from premises of consignees or shippers. The cost of direct pick-up and delivery service is to be borne by consignee or shipper, it being assumed that the trucking charge would reflect a portion of the economy hoped to be realized by the carrier and attractive to consignee or shipper.

"The carriers being responsible for freight between their station and store door, may select their own truck or truckmen. Trucking costs within the zone should be made uniform by all carriers and to all consignees and shippers."

Several studies of the problem have been made, and the Port of New York Authority has recommended the establishment of a universal inland station for the handling of freight on the block between Eighth and Ninth Avenues and Fifteenth and Sixteenth Streets. Mr. Hichborn has long studied the matter, also, and served fourteen years with the Grand Trunk Railway system, part of the time as general agent in New York City, and twenty years as general traffic manager of the United States Rubber system.

MUENCHEN INSURANCE HINGES ON FIRE CAUSE

If Spontaneous Combustion Is Fixed as Origin "Inherent Vice" Factor Will Be Involved.

The outcome of the differences of opinion between Fire Marshal Thomas P. Brophy and officials of the North German Lloyd on the cause of the explosions and fire aboard the liner Muenchen last Tuesday at Pier 42, North River, will have an important bearing on the volume of losses that will be borne by the insurance companies, according to The Weekly Underwriter, published here yesterday.

If Mr. Brophy is finally sustained in his opinion that spontaneous combustion was the cause of the explosions and fire, the insurance companies carrying the risk on the freight in which it occurred will be relieved of the expense, but the underwriters of the risk on the rest of the freight must pay their losses, according to the publication, which states the case as follows:

"The officers of the line insist that the cause of the disaster is not traceable to the cargo, and upon the question of whether or not they can sustain this contention will rest much of the recovery of the underwriters. The Muenchen was insured exclusively in the German market, and probably for not less than $3,000,000, although cabled advices from Bremen and London are giving the hull coverage as low as $1,500,000.

"The cargo is believed to have been insured for its full value. About 50 per cent of it was underwritten in the American market. It is impossible to do more than approximate the cargo value at this time, as declarations on imports are not made until a vessel arrives; but it is safe to estimate the valuation at $500,000.

"Fire Marshal Thomas P. Brophy in a report to Fire Commissioner Dorman gives spontaneous combustion of the cargo in No. 6 hold as the cause of the fire. There were five distinct explosions, but nobody seems to know what caused them. Here is the underwriting angle: If there was spontaneous combustion the underwriters on the cargo where it occurred cannot be held responsible because of 'inherent vice'; but [illegible] have to [illegible] fire [illegible] the [illegible] Inchmaree [illegible] not covered [illegible] policies—P. & I. insurance takes care of pier damage."

BUYS LOS ANGELES PLANT.

San Francisco Company Gets Big Shipyard There.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 15.—The plant of the Los Angeles Shipbuilding and Drydock Corporation has been purchased by George A. Armes, president of the General Engineering and Drydock Company of San Francisco. Mr. Armes said he would take over the operation of the plant April 1.

The value of the Los Angeles shipyard is estimated at between $2,500,000 and $3,000,000, but the deal involves more money than that, as large timber holdings and real estate in the Pacific Northwest were included in the transaction.

N. Y. A. C. Trio Loses to Optimists, 19-6; P. M. C. Beats Riding and Driving, 20-11½

OPTIMISTS DEFEAT N. Y. A. C. TRIO, 19-6

Leaders in Met. Indoor Polo Circuit Continue Pace for Fourth Straight Victory.

RIDING CLUB ALSO WINS

Turns Back Peter Pan, 5-3, in Sensational Match—Squadron A Beats Farmington Valley, 12-5.

By ROBERT F. KELLEY.

Winston Guest's Optimists continued their unbeaten pace in the lead of the metropolitan indoor polo circuit last night, turning back the New York Athletic Club, 19 to 6, for their fourth straight circuit victory. They have yet to be defeated this season and were never in danger last night, despite the fact that the Winged Foot team played good polo and made play fast and interesting throughout.

The Optimists, riding with Raymon Guest, Winston Guest and Lieutenant McDonald Jones in that order, have been playing sensational polo all season and last night carried on at a steady, relentless attacking speed that threatened now and then to sweep the Athletic Club team down to a very one-sided defeat.

Losers Draw Applause.

The losers played with Harry Albright, Dr. John Richards and Cyril Harrison in that order and, despite the size of the score, turned in their share of fine polo. It was Dr. Richards's first game indoors this year and his hitting was a bit off, but he had spots of good play and both Harrison and Albright drew applause from the gallery for fine stroking.

But the Optimists, as a team and as individuals, gave a great exhibition of riding and hitting. Winston Guest continued the pace that has made him the highest ranked player in the game; Lieutenant Jones was again a brilliant back and the younger Guest turned in a very good exhibition at No. 1. As they went last night, the Optimists looked like a team to be favored in the national championships which start next month.

First Game is Sensational.

The first circuit game of the evening, between the Riding Club and Peter Pan, turned into the hardest fought and most sensational match the season has produced. The regular game extended over into a five-minute extra period before the Riding Club came through on goals by Thomas Ewing Jr. and Bob Law to win, 5 to 3.

Both teams went into action without their veteran members. Earle Hopping Sr., ill with a cold, was unable to play for the Riding Club and his place was taken by William Duryea, a young Princeton graduate. William Reber, who recently transferred from Essex Troop to Peter Pan, took the place of Archer Kinny on the latter team and played fast, hard-riding polo throughout.

The evening opened with a Class C Squadron A team defeating Farmington Valley, 12 to 5.

P. M. C. IS VICTOR IN BROOKLYN POLO

Defeats Riding and Driving Club, 20-11½, in Met. Indoor Circuit Class A Game.

101ST CAVALRY ALSO WINS

Beats Governors Island Trio, 12-8—Riding and Driving Wins in Class C.

Pennsylvania Military College practically assured itself of second place in the metropolitan indoor polo circuit last night in the 101st Cavalry Armory, Brooklyn, when it defeated the Brooklyn Riding and Driving Club, 20 to 11½, in four periods of Class A competition. The winners received the enormous handicap of 12 goals, but during the first and third periods showed a disposition to win on the flat.

Bill Nicholls vied with Gerry Smith and Warren Sackman for the honors of the night. Nicholls led his P. M. C. trio in scoring with six goals and made countless saves and turns that kept the R. and D. in check. It was Nicholls's three goals in the opener that put his team far in front.

The R. and D. did not get going until the second, when Smith began to play his sensational polo. He got three goals in that period, and followed with one in the third and two in the final. Altogether the R. and D. scored six times in the second, two from the mallet of Sackman and one by Carl Pflug.

The 101st Cavalry staged a remarkable comeback to defeat Governors Island in the Class B semi-final game, 12 to 8, in four periods of exceedingly fast polo. The Cavalry men gave the army officers a handicapo f one goal.

But the 101st Cavalry was outclassed in the opening period when Lieutenant Homer Kiefer led Governors Island in a slashing attack that put his team out in front, 5½ to 0, at the end of the chukker.

The 101st got going in the second period when Milton Kornblum led a rally that netted six goals and put the cavalry out in front at half-time, 6 to 5½.

In the preliminary Class C match the Riding and Driving Club defeated the 101st Cavalry, 7½ to 7, the winners receiving three goals by handicap. Reg Webster led in scoring for the victors with three goals, while Barney O'Donnell and John Wallace starred for the losers.

BABY JOE GANS VICTOR.

Damaged Eye Prevents Drako From Answering Bell for 7th.

Baby Joe Gans, Los Angeles welterweight, won by a technical knockout when Billy Drako failed to answer the bell for the seven round because of a damaged eye, in the feature ten-round bout at the Olympia Boxing Club last night.

Drake appeared to be holding his own until then. The weights were: Gans, 144½; Drako, 147¾.

A badly cut right eye caused Referee Johnny Marto to halt the listed ten-round semi-final in 2:50 of the ninth and award victory to Cecil (Kid) Como, east side, 131, over Pasquale Bounfiglio of Argentina, 135¾.

Ray Rivera, Porto Rico, 135½, easily beat Vincent Sanchez, west side, 134, in six rounds. Martin Oroz of Spain, 147½, won on a foul from Allan Gibbs, Harlem, 142, in the second. Johnny Masi, Corona, 134¾, defeated Tony Faust, east side, 135½, in a four-rounder.

JOHNSON WILL BOX LATZO IN GARDEN

Chicago Light-Heavyweight and Ex-Welterweight Titleholder to Meet Friday Night.

VOLANTE-CARLTON MATCHED

Carded for Main Bout at the St. Nicholas Arena Tomorrow—Gillis to Box Elkins.

By JAMES P. DAWSON.

Larry Johnson, Chicago's spectacular negro light-heavyweight, will be on exhibition Friday night in Madison Square Garden. Johnson, who knocked out Leo Mitchell, Joe Sekyra and Fred Lenhart in a campaign which established him as one of the most dangerous contenders for the light-heavyweight title now held by Jimmy Slattery, is to battle Pete Latzo, former breaker-boy of the Scranton mines, who once held the welterweight title.

They are paired for ten rounds as the feature of a card arranged by Matchmaker Tom McArdle when his plans for a bout between Kid Chocolate and Al Ridgeway collapsed.

Supporting the main bout will be a ten-round semi-final between Doc Conrad, Newark boxer, who recently conquered Harry Ebbets, and Babe McGorgary, Oklahoma middleweight, who boasts a knockout over Conrad. Vince Dundee, younger brother of Joe, is to engage Buck Lawless of Syracuse in the first ten-round bout.

Latzo Faces Difficult Task.

Followers of boxing are predicting another knockout conquest for Johnson when he faces Latzo. The Scranton veteran of eleven years of ring warfare is confronted with a difficult assignment. Forced to forego ring activity about a year ago because of a broken jaw received in a bout with James J. Braddock, Latzo resumed boxing four months ago in an effort to re-establish himself, without any great measure of success. He knocked out one Eddie Clark and then was subjected to a lambasting by Billy Jones, a capable performer of Philadelphia. Latzo shows his old courage in undertaking a match against Johnson, but it is doubtful if his courage will avail against the man who laid low Mitchell, Sekyra and the stout-hearted Lenhart.

Conrad and McGorgary are expected to furnish an exciting skirmish, if their previous battles hereabouts can be taken as a criterion, and a spectacular match is looked for when the younger Dundee squares off against Lawless.

Carlton to Meet Volante.

A fistic carnival is counted on tomorrow night at the St. Nicholas Arena when Dominick Volante, English lightweight, tackles Harry Carlton of Jersey City in the principal bout of ten rounds. This is a return engagement and has attracted unusual attention. In their last appearance as a supporting bout to a Garden feature the rivals fought a hurricane draw. Ben Jeby, east side middleweight, and Billy Franklin of the west side are paired in the ten-round semi-final. Jackie Schweitzer and Frankie Marchese, lightweights, will meet in a special bout of eight rounds.

A return bout of ten rounds between Hubert Gillis, Belgian lightweight, and Eddie Elkins of Harlem is scheduled as the feature attraction tomorrow night at the Jamaica arena. In a previous encounter Elkins knocked out the Belgian, but despite this reverse Gillis's admirers are backing him heavily to conquer Elkins. Manny Davis and Jerry Kline, welterweights, are to provide the ten-round semi-final.

Sid Terris, erstwhile Ghetto Ghost who once threatened to become world's lightweight champion, returns to local boxing Tuesday night in the Broadway arena, Brooklyn, where he is to battle Gaston Charles, rugged French lightweight, for ten rounds. Lew Feldman, Brownsville featherweight favorite, is to engage Frankie Albano, former National Guard champion, in the ten-round semi-final. Ray Cummings and Joe La Bate, lightweights, are paired for the first ten-round event.

RECORD RENTAL VALUES FOR MADISON AVENUE BLOCK

SEEKING TO WIDEN LOWER BROADWAY

Broadway Association Will Present Plan to Borough President Miller.

MANY BUILDINGS OBSOLETE

Sponsors Say Project Would Revive Trade From the City Hall to Twenty-third Street.

In an effort to promote the plan for widening Broadway from City Hall Park north to Twenty-third Street, the Broadway Association, which is sponsoring the improvement project, has started engineering studies of the district and has compiled considerable data on real estate and trade activity there.

The survey is being conducted under the direction of the traffic committee of the association, J. E. Harrington, chairman, with the aid of Major Henry Opdycke. Several conferences have been held and Mr. Harrington reports that the progress of the work is such that the association probably will present the proposal, with the findings of its survey, to Borough President Miller within two months, and at the same time report support for the plan by many civic organizations and most of the merchants and property owners in the territory.

The association expresses the conviction that even with the question of traffic relief left out of consideration the project would be a profitable investment through a rejuvenation of business and building activity in the zone, a large part of which is now comparatively quiescent. The increase in tax values, which would be likely to follow the improvement, would soon more than pay the widening costs, points out Mr. Harrington, who announces that the Board of Trade and Transportation, W. J. L. Banham, president, has endorsed the plan, in addition to a number of property owners who are members of the Broadway Association.

Statistics compiled by the committee show that the assessed valuation of the land on the west side of Broadway from City Hall Park to Twenty-third Street is $32,308,500, and value of land with buildings aggregates $58,467,000. On the east side, the assessed value of land alone aggregates $33,690,500, and lots and buildings $64,227,500. The total valuation of the 391 parcels, with their improvements is $122,894,500. Sixty-six block fronts are involved.

Most of the district now is built up with warehouses and lofts, the survey shows, with occasional office building groups. Entire block fronts, mostly occupied by five and six-story buildings, are marked "obsolete" on the association's chart, although in a few areas, notably at Prince Street, East Houston, Reade, West Fourth, East Twelfth and East Twentieth Streets, modern structures predominate. According to the chart, obsolete buildings outnumber the modern by three to one. Only twelve buildings are more than fifteen stories in height.

Anticipates Traffic Relief.

"It is common knowledge that lower Manhattan long has suffered from lack of traffic freedom and the plan for widening lower Broadway would go a long way in easing congestion," Mr. Harrison says. "One measure of relief for the downtown section already is being developed in the construction of the West Side Marginal Highway connecting Canal Street and Riverside Drive, but others are imperative.

"Because some of the longitudinal avenues in Manhattan begin to lose their identity south of Twenty-third and Fourteenth Streets, a great amount of traffic is multiplied on lesser thoroughfares. Lafayette Street is practically the only wide street south of Fourteenth Street capable of giving adequate service to north and south traffic. It appears logical to those who have given the subject thought, to undertake the widening of at least one other artery leading downtown before more extensive improvements are contemplated and the cost of such a project is increased.

"Broadway has been selected as the thoroughfare most likely to give such relief because it has a direct relation to the large proportion of traffic headed to and from the financial district. Broadway has a width of only forty-four and one-half feet from curb to curb from Twenty-third Street south and the particular section selected for the proposed improvement presents the least resistance because many buildings there have outgrown their usefulness and must eventually be the object of a vast reconstruction program. Early realization of the plan would make provision in advance for the expansion of the district and would avoid traffic complications."

UPTOWN CLUB MOVES.

New Quarters in Lincoln Building Will Open Tomorrow.

The Uptown Club, a luncheon organization whose members chiefly are business executives of the midtown district, has moved from 17 East Forty-second Street to the Lincoln Building. The club will open its new quarters, occupying the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh floors of the new skyscraper, tomorrow.

On the twenty-sixth floor a foyer and a cloakroom opens to a lounge finished with paneled walls and Colonial fixtures. Eleven private dining rooms on the floor are finished in green chintz. A reception hall and ladies' dining room are decorated in green figured Japanese wall paper. Kitchen and service quarters also are on that floor.

A circular stairway leads from the reception hall to the twenty-seventh floor and a foyer connecting with two dining rooms. An outdoor promenade terrace is provided.

Trading Period Is Doubled On Real Estate Exchange

Beginning tomorrow, the trading period on the floor of the New York Real Estate Securities Exchange will be extended to two hours daily, instead of one, except on Saturday, when the one-hour period will be maintained.

In announcing the additional trading time, Charles G. Edwards, president of the Exchange, said yesterday:

"The one-hour trading period, which at first was considered adequate, has proved too short for the present volume of business of many of the members. The closing bell has been cutting short the day's normal business for them, and it is due to the request of the members that the trading time has been extended."

DOWNTOWN LEAGUE BUILDING AWARDS

Bank of Manhattan Gets First Honor, With 120 Wall Street Second.

Awards for the best buildings this year in the lower part of the city have just been made by the Downtown League. David Robinson, president of the league, announces that first prize was given to the seventy-story Bank of Manhattan Trust Company Building on Wall Street between Nassau and William Streets. It was erected by Starrett Brothers and designed by H. Craig Severance. The structure covers a ground base of approximately 34,000 square feet.

Honorable mention was given to the thirty-three-story 120 Wall Street Building facing South Street, erected by Henry Greenberg and David Malzman from designs by the architect, Ely Jacques Kahn.

The committee awarded first prize for the best alteration to Alice Foote MacDougall for her branch restaurant, 129-131 Maiden Lane, the architectural work being in charge of H. Drewry Baker of the firm of Kenneth M. Murchison.

It is a reproduction of the old French Tavern l'Auberge du Vieux Puits—in English The Inn of the Old Well. The inn was built about the time of William the Conqueror in the eleventh century.

The committee having charge of the awards consisted of William H. Class of George R. Reed & Co., A. H. Fromm, in charge of real estate for the H. L. Doherty interests, and Charles F. Noyes.

Mr. Robinson, in commenting on the awards, stated it was impossible for the league to make any awards for the year 1929 on account of the number of oustandingly important artistic and interesting new buildings and alterations in the downtown field. The committee, however, ranked the New York Bank and Trust Company Building at Wall and William Streets and the Lee, Higginson & Co. Building at 39 Broad Street as the two best structures erected, and 2 Rector Street, owned by the Electric Bond and Share Company, and the building at 1-3 South William Street, owned by Lehman Brothers, as the two best alterations.

Transit Plans for Kings.

Brooklyn is to have nearly seventeen miles of the second proposed city owned and operated subway system recently announced by the Board of Transportation. The actual track mileage mapped for that borough will be sixty-one and one-half miles and the estimated cost of construction is $114,500,000.

Building Owners' Convention.

The twenty-third annual convention of the National Association of Building Owners and Managers will be held in Biloxi, Miss., June 9 to 13. It will be the first meeting held in the South since 1915, when the association met in Atlanta, Ga.

A NEW rental record for store space on Madison Avenue has recently been established in the leasing of several of the stores on the avenue frontage in the new Plaza building, now virtually completed on the easterly block front between Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Streets. An average of $1,500 a foot is being obtained for the entire Madison Avenue frontage. With possibly two or three exceptions in the Forty-second Street area, this is the highest price ever paid for a block frontage of stores anywhere on the avenue. The Warendorff florist shop which recently rented on a long term the 16 by 45 foot store on the Madison Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street corner is reported to be paying an average of close to if not fully, $2,000 a front foot, the 16 feet being on the avenue.

Another important lease was that of Schraffts for another of its branch restaurants. This involved a frontage of 26 feet on Madison Avenue in the middle of the block with rear extensions to both Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Streets for service and other purposes. For this space it is reported that $110,000 per year is paid.

Another illustration of good rental values in this locality is seen in leases recently closed through Butler & Baldwin for the store and office space in the new five-story building just completed at 601-603 Madison Avenue, fronting 51 feet and adjoining the tall Fuller building just opened on the northeast corner of the avenue and Fifty-seventh Street. The five-story building is 92 per cent rented, a high record for any commercial structure on the avenue. For the southerly store, fronting 16.6 feet by 100 in depth, the English Antique Company is paying $25,000 per year on a fifteen year lease and the three upper floors have been rented at an average of $10,000 a floor. The entire building is held on a long leasehold by the Mayhew Shop, Ltd., which is paying a net rental of $51,000 per year. The Mayhew Shop occupies the remaining store space and a portion of the second floor. The structural operation represents a cost of about $140,000.

Explains High Rentals.

"These high rentals immediately south of Fifty-ninth Street are influenced by the fact that there is a limited amount of good space on the avenue in that locality," explained Charles D. Holt of the Butler & Baldwin firm. "The increasing importance of Fifty-seventh Street as a select shopping thoroughfare is another factor and also the close proximity to the high-class hotels and apartment houses near by, such as the Savoy-Plaza, the Plaza, Netherlands, Delmonico, the new Pierre's going up at Fifth Avenue and Sixty-first Street and the Park Avenue apartments

"The contrast in store rentals immediately north and south of Fifty-ninth Street has become more pronounced within the last three months. More than the usual number of store vacancies are noticeable in the blocks north of Fifty-ninth Street and several vacancies have occurred since November. It is no secret that store rentals all along the avenue above Fifty-ninth Street are being made today at lower prices than was the case six months ago and in some cases liberal concessions are being made.

"Two or three taxpayers recently completed in that area are still untenanted. This does not mean that the area is actually suffering from any marked business depression. The additional number of vacancies are due to the fact that there is a temporary business recession and also to the large number of stores available. The steadily increasing apartment house population on and immediately adjacent to the avenue is bringing a larger small store clientele every year and conditions are bound to reach a more normal status within the next year or two.

"Fundamentally there is nothing the matter with the avenue, one proof of which may be seen in the four or five big apartment house operations now under way."

New Apartment Operations.

Five large apartment houses are being constructed on the avenue at present north of Seventy-sixth Street. The largest operation involves the easterly block front between Seventy-sixth and Seventy-seventh Streets, where the Calvin Morris Corporation, Morris Ginsberg, president, is erecting the forty-story Carlyle apartment hotel on the Seventy-sixth Street half of the block and a fourteen-story apartment on the Seventy-seventh Street section. The Carlyle will be the tallest edifice on upper Madison Avenue, and both houses are expected to be ready for tenants in October.

At Eighty-eighth Street two operations are under way, on the northeast and southeast corners respectively. The building on the southeast corner, to be known as 40 East Eighty-eighth Street, will be fourteen stories in height with setbacks. It is being erected by Joseph Gilbert for the owners, the E. Claman estate, incorporated as the Namalc Realty Company from plans by Sugarman & Berger. The house on the northeast corner, also fourteen stories, to be known as 47 East Eighty-eighth Street, will be a cooperative structure, erected by A. H. McRae and Normal Woolworth from plans by George F. Pelham. Pease & Elliman are the renting agents of both houses, which are expected to be ready for occupancy early in the Fall.

The fifth operation is at the northeast corner of Ninety-sixth Street, where the Larrington Realties Holding Corporation, Thomas W. Lamb, president, is erecting an eighteen-story house from plans by Mr. Lamb. Joseph Garry is the builder and H. S. Hillyer & Co. will be the managing agents. That firm, hitherto specializing the lower Fifth Avenue apartments, will open an uptown office in the building. All of the houses will have stores on the Madison Avenue frontage.

One illustration of the changing conditions which have been apparent recently in the realty and business world is seen in the temporary abandonment of the project by Klien & Jackson to erect a commercial structure of forty or more stories on the site of the well-known Hoffman Arms apartment on the westerly side of Madison Avenue, between Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Streets. It had been the intention to start demolition of that structure this month and all the tenants in the apartments were required to vacate prior to the first of the year. Several of the store occupants also moved. It has now been decided to postpone work for a year and the vacant stores have been placed in the hands of Pease & Elliman to rent, but the rentals will contain a clause for cancelation within three months. The Hoffman Arms, therefore, is now divested of tenants, many of whom had been there for years and has three or four vacant stores.

One of the attractive business operations lately finished is the building occupied by Di Salvo Brothers, antique furniture dealers, at 702 and 704 Madison Avenue, adjoining the neat building of the Bank of New York and Trust Company on the southwest Sixty-third Street corner. The building replaced two old brownstone houses fronting forty feet, the architects being DePace & Juster. The property is under lease for a long term to the Di Salvo Brothers at $32,000 net per year.

Another commercial operation just finished is the two-story taxpayer with eight stores at the northwest corner of Sixty-fifth Street, having half a block frontage on the avenue. The property is under a long leasehold by the Braus Galleries at $50,000 net per year, Thomas Weatherley being the owner. No stores are yet leased. The leasehold includes the adjoining plot at 2 East Sixty-fifth Street, on which a five-story building alteration has been made as an addition to the Mary Louise Plumbridge shop and apartment at 19.

An idea of rental values there is seen in the fact that the Plumbridge interests are paying the Braus Galleries $9,500 for the first seven years, $10,500 for the next seven years and $11,500 for the final seven-year period.

Apartment House Fully Rented.

The nine-story Plumbridge apartment at 19 East Sixty-fifth Street, the ground floor of which is occupied by the store, is, points out Charles D. Holt, one of the outstanding successes from a rental viewpoint in the upper Madison Avenue area. The building was finished about two years ago and has two apartments on a floor, the rental averaging $4,000 a floor. It is 100 per cent rented. The Plumbridge concern was one of the pioneer business firms on upper Madison Avenue.

The only individual commercial operation likely to be seen in this locality this season will be a seven-story building at 697-699 Madison Avenue, adjoining the Sherry Building at the northeast Sixty-second Street corner. The two houses on the site have a frontage of forty feet but a depth of only fifty feet. The building, which is to be erected by the owner, has been leased on a long term by the Fortmason Shoe Company, an English concern, for $52,500 net per year. Work is expected to start early in July.

Two apartment house operations, planned last year, have been temporarily postponed. One involved the southeast corner of Seventy-ninth Street. The old buildings have been torn down and a board fence is now around the property. There is also another vacant plot, but smaller in size, at the southeast corner of Ninety-first Street, the site of a prospective apartment edifice.

CITY PLANNING EXHIBITS.

Models of Metropolitan Projects for Home Show.

Public projects which have attracted attention to the achievements of engineers and city planners in the New York area will be exhibited in model or photographic form in the city planning section which will be a feature of the 1930 Home Show at Grand Central Palace March 31 to April 5.

Because attractive surroundings, transportation and playgrounds have an important bearing in the development of home areas, both for individual and apartment homes, city and county officials of New York, Westchester, Long Island and New Jersey will cooperate in staging the 3,500-square-foot exhibit which will show visitors the outstanding projects completed or planned in the metropolitan area.

E. P. Goodrich, consulting engineer of New York, who is also engineering adviser to the Government of China, is chairman of the city planning committee of the Home Show. Associated with him are several well-known engineers and city planners.

Borough President Harvey of Queens, in a letter to the committee, stated that John J. Halleran, director of public works, will have charge of that borough's display.

USING THIRTY-TON STONES.

Irving Trust Skyscraper Is of Granite and Limestone.

The fifty-story skyscraper of the Irving Trust Company at Broadway and Wall Streets is rapidly taking form. The exterior is of granite and limestone, and more than 400 carloads of the latter material are being used. A large part of this material has reached New York.

Some of the blocks weigh thirty tons. These are transferred by barge to Long Island City to be cut into proper sizes and shapes. Owing to the heavy traffic at Broadway and Wall Street bulky materials cannot be stored there and the stone must be put in place quickly. The usual straight wall effect will be avoided by setting stones to form a series of angles in and out from the normal wall line, and by use of bent frame windows, according to the architects, Voorhees, Gmelin & Walker. Preparations are well advanced for the installation of a three-story vault, which will extend along the block front between Wall and New Streets.

City Club Favors Terminal On Eighth Avenue Block

Final action has not yet been made by the Commissioners of the Port of New York Authority on establishing the projected railroad freight terminal on the block bounded by Eighth and Ninth Avenues, Fifteenth and Sixteenth Streets, as the details regarding leasing terms with the railroads are still under negotiation, announces the City Club in its recent Bulletin. The club expresses the hope that it may be possible to start actual work within a short time.

In regard to the many objections cited by various realty and other associations against the use of that site for terminal purposes, the City Club reports that, after a careful study of the situation, it endorsed the plan.

SEEKS STRICTER LAW TO BAR MENDICANTS

Sixth Avenue Association Also Wants New Restrictions on Street Signs.

More stringent laws against mendicants and so-called "pullers-in" in the Sixth Avenue district are being sought by the Sixth Avenue Association, which is making a study of the problem with a view to suggesting amendments to the existing ordinances at an early date, according to V. Clement Jenkins, vice president and general manager.

"While our association has cooperated with other organizations during the past year in obtaining restrictive legislation against beggars and peddlers who seem to feel that this is a fertile field in which to operate," says Mr. Jenkins, "we bellieve that further amendments to the law are necessary, particularly with respect to increasing the penalty imposed on persons found operating in restricted areas."

The association also expects to make application to the Board of Aldermen for amendment to the sign ordinance to place Sixth Avenue in the list of restricted streets.

Consideration is also being given to a proposal that medals be awarded to architects and owners of the best new business structures erected on the thoroughfare each year, with a view to influencing the design of new buildings and particularly the store fronts. The plan is considered advisable in view of the "fertile field for proper realty and business developments now existing on Sixth Avenue."

Mr. Jenkins pointed out that a large number of buildings on the avenue are obsolete and will in time have to be replaced with modern business structures to care for the needs of expanding trade. Recent research by the association indicates that a new era in business and building is about to begin. The body is advocating the removal of the Sixth Avenue elevated as soon as practicable, in the belief that its demolition will foster development.

Costliest Clubhouse.

Aside from being the most striking clubhouse in the city the New York Athletic Club property at Sixth Avenue and Central Park South is by far the most valuable of all club homes in the country. The New York City assessors have appraised it at $5,500,000. It has a close rival in this respect in the American Women's Club on West Fifty-seventh Street, which is assessed at $5,100,000. The University Club on Fifth Avenue is third at $4,700,000.

Manhattan's Transit Share.

Nearly twelve miles of the proposed second city owned and operated subway route with more than forty-five miles of tracks will be Manhattan's share of the one hundred mile route planned by the Board of Transportation for four of the five boroughs. The estimated cost of actual construction of Manhattan's share is $126,800,000.

WEST 34TH STREET CHANGING RAPIDLY

Association Urges Extension of Retail Zone Area to Tenth Avenue.

INCREASE IN APARTMENTS

East Side Blocks Also Destined to Witness Great Modern Development.

Enlargement of the retail business district to the westerly blocks in the Thirty-fourth Street area is being advocated by the Thirty-fourth Street-Midtown Association and favorable action by the Board of Estimate is expected at an early date. The area subject to change includes the Thirty-third, Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Street blocks as far west as Tenth Avenue.

This territory now is unrestricted and certain forms of business, which are undesirable or even dangerous in high-grade real estate sections, are permissible.

The action of the Thirty-fourth Street-Midtown Association in initiating this protection of the West Thirty-fourth Street district was due to the request of many real estate men who are promoting the improvement of that district.

The completion and recent opening of the New Yorker Hotel, it is pointed out, gave a marked impetus to high-class development in that westerly area. It occupies the westerly Eighth Avenue blockfront between Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Streets. When construction was begun it stood in a wholly unrestricted use district, but before it was completed the retail use district was created by the Board of Estimate, but at present that only covers the easterly frontage of the hotel.

New Apartment Centre.

West Thirty-fourth Street, reports the association, is already witnessing an important apartment house development. Shroder & Koppel, in the block between Ninth and Tenth Avenues, have recently completed a sixteen-story apartment; it is 90 per cent rented.

Haddon Hall, under construction by the Magoba Construction Company, in the same block, is nearing completion. The Webster Hall apartments, in the same block, is planning an extension on Thirty-fifth Street which will double its capacity. On the south side, 440 West Thirty-fourth Street, recently purchased from Albert Mayer by Edgar Ellinger, has been fully rented. Several other sites in the block have been assembled.

"It will be two years," states Julius Nelson of the association, "before the new Eighth Avenue subway will be ready for operation and the public hearings on the proposed new east side subway routes are only now in progress, so no relief from the latter line can be expected under the most favorable circumstances for from six to eight years, because subways cannot be built over night despite anything thoughtless people may say.

"Meanwhile traffic and transit congestion continues to increase and the chance to be freed from the disagreeable crowding that prevails and must continue for a considerable time in every existing transit facility makes absolutely certain the 100 per cent renting of properly built, fairly-priced apartments in both the East and the West Thirty-fourth Street sections, within easy walking distance."

Commenting on the plans for an early removal of the East Thirty-fourth Street elevated spur, the association states that it will mark the beginning of a new era for the East Thirty-fourth Street and St. Gabriel's Park territory, where a new residential, walk-to-work community of the highest type, will replace the old, insanitary cold-water tenements, stables and tumble-down lofts.

New East Side Conditions.

"No other spot in Manhattan," it is stated, "seems better suited to such a development. It is centrally located and has the advantage of wide streets, a small park, and will benefit by the East River Drive improvement. It is within easy walking distance of the Grand Central Terminal, the Pennsylvania Station, the Hudson Tubes and Long Island Railroad. It is at the front door of the city's principal retail shopping district and taxi fare to the theatrical and amusement centre is a modest sum, if one does not care to use the surface cars.

"Tenants will come from the Grand Central section on the north where, by April, four new office buildings will be opened with a population of 30,000 to add to the thousands already there.

Recent improvements in the Sixth and Seventh Avenue areas include the construction, now under way, of a forty-five-story building surrounding the northwest corner of Seventh Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, with an extension to Thirty-fifth Street. On the southwest corner of Thirty-fourth Street and Seventh Avenue the twenty-story Levy Building has been completed and tenants are moving in.

On the northeast corner of Seventh Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street the Macy department store is expanding into the Banner & Mittler Building. The small lot on the northeast corner of Thirty-fourth Street and Seventh Avenue is occupied by a three-story building soon to be torn down and replaced by a building nineteen stories, being another addition to the Macy store.

The Thirty-fourth Street block from Sixth Avenue to Fifth Avenue is also to see changes during the next two years. On the south side the new Equitable Trust Building is nearing completion. On the north side the old Equitable Trust which was formerly the New Netherland Bank in 1902, has been acquired by Vivian Green and is to be torn down as soon as the Equitable moves into its new building in the Spring. Mr. Green will build a six-story building as an addition to the Worth store.

ACTIVE FEATURES OF CITY AND SUBURBAN REAL ESTATE

$7,000,000 SPENT ON MODEL HOUSING

State Law Fosters Building of Modern Apartments at Low Rentals.

GRAND ST. SITE CLEARED

Rabinowitz Explains Plan for Management of New Flats by Amalgamated Dwellings, Inc.

Since the passage of the State housing law and the creation of the State Board of Housing less than four years ago more than $7,000,000 has been spent in this city on model residential quarters for wage earners, according to Aaron Rabinowitz, member of the board, who has just completed a survey showing the progress of the movement to provide comfortable apartments at low rentals for those now forced to live in dilapidated houses in the old tenement districts.

Tax exemptions and other inducements offered in the law to builders of houses with restricted rentals and limited profits have fostered the construction of several large apartment buildings, and the response to these enterprises has been gratifying, Mr. Rabinowitz pointed out. Several other model apartments are in the course of construction, and demand for suites in these structures indicates that they are likely to be fully occupied soon after completion, he said, explaining the plan whereby the State Housing Board's buildings going up on the site of the Hoe printing press factory facing Grand Street would be managed and operated by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers.

"The housing problem is one which every great city has had to meet sooner or later," said Mr. Rabinowitz. "The larger the city, the greater the problem, as a rule. Berlin, Paris, London, Amsterdam and other chief cities of Europe have faced the same situation that confronts the population centres of the United States. In this country until a few years ago laws aimed only at preventing bad housing, but about a decade ago the constructive side of the problem began to claim attention. At first it was thought that commercial builders might take care of the situation, but rising land values and increasing construction costs have discouraged such builders from supplying the need for low-rental suites.

"The Amalgamated Clothing Workers were the first to avail themselves of the opportunities afforded by the New York law. In 1927 they created the Amalgamated Housing Corporation and built an apartment building containing more than 1,000 rooms overlooking Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx.

Living Standards Rise.

"Most of the tenants now living in the Amalgamated building in the Bronx came from the lower east side. The conditions under which they lived in the east side tenements need not be described. In their new homes, new conditions of life have been created. In all essentials they have improved not only their mode but their standard of living. This is true not only with respect to the material conditions of life, but also with regard to the opportunities for social and educational advancement.

"A cooperative group created the Farband Housing Corporation and constructed a building on Williamsbridge Road, between Matthews and Barnes Avenues, in the Bronx, at a cost of $675,000. The building contains 130 apartments with average rentals of $11 per room per month.

"In Brooklyn, a committee appointed by the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, under the guidance of Louis H. Pink, a member of the State board, has erected a large apartment building on Fourth Avenue between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets, containing 677 rooms, at a cost of $740,000. The average rental in this building is $10.60 per room per month. Following this successful experiment, the same company is erecting another apartment building containing 335 rooms in the navy yard section of Brooklyn in which the rents will be somewhat less than $11 per room per month. This building will cost approximately $450,000.

"On the lower east side another cooperative apartment is being built, which Lieut. Gov. Lehman and I are sponsoring. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers, as a result of their successful experience in the Bronx, have undertaken the management and operation of this project. They have created a new corporation to be known as Amalgamated Dwellings, Inc., which will build and operate the building. The apartments will be sold to tenant owners on initial payments of as little as $150 per room and the rents will not exceed $12.50 per room per month.

Demolition of the old buildings has been completed and excavation has been started. Construction will proceed at once, and the cost of the buildings will be $1,700,000. Approximately two-thirds of the total cost will be advanced on first mortgage by the Bowery Savings Bank at 5 per cent for twenty years. We can demonstrate here that it is possible to build the best type of modern apartment building, containing every improvement and embodying the highest standards in low-priced model housing. It is our hope that others will carry on as a result of this demonstration.

Require Ample Light and Air.

"For all dwellings erected under the law the State Board of Housing requires higher standards of construction and planning than are ordinarily applied to buildings of this class.

"I have been asked if it would not be possible to reduce the rents even further by reducing the standards of the building, providing smaller rooms and fewer facilities. My experience has shown that the economies would be so slight as not to justify the inferior apartments. My experience has also shown that there is a minimum rent below which it is impossible to provide decent housing. For families that cannot pay that minimum rent we are convinced that nothing can be done. If a man has only 4 cents he cannot get into the subway, but if he has 5 cents he can get a twenty-mile ride. So it is with housing. If a family can make the grade and pay the required rent, we can provide for it under the State housing law.

"The housing experiments under the law have shown that wage earners' families can find escape from the worst tenements in the congested areas of the city. They can create for themselves modern dwellings that offer the benefits of sunlight, fresh air and the opportunities for healthful living. These experiments have shown that families that never before could aspire to home ownership can actually own their own home."

NEW SUBWAY LINES CREATE REALTY VALUES

Joseph P. Day Predicts Increased Development on the West of Manhattan.

"Rapid transit lines constitute the strongest single influence on real estate values in Manhattan," said Joseph P. Day yesterday. "As long as all our subways and elevated railroads were being built on north and south routes expansion in building developments and increasing real estate prices followed the same line of direction.

"But New York is passing out of the era of spectacular growth along north and south lines and is entering an equally tremendous era of growth from east to west, particularly in the midtown area between Thirty-fourth and Fifty-ninth Streets.

I believe that an important factor in this development is going to be the Fifty-third Street subway now under construction which will connect the nearly completed Eighth Avenue subway with the Queens subway system at Mott Avenue."

Mr. Day expressed the belief that when these lines are completed the area in the neighborhood of the junction of the two subways at Eighth Avenue and West Fifty-third Street should become a business, shopping and amusement centre comparable to Times Square and the Grand Central Zone.

He also pointed out that Manhattan west of Central Park, once so popular, which had apparently suffered a decline in favor of Park Avenue, is now rapidly coming back into its own.

The completion of the Eighth Avenue subway is all that is needed fully to restore this region to the fashionable favor it deserves.

Next Tuesday at noon in the Real Estate Exchange, 56 Vesey Street, Mr. Day will sell at auction a carefully selected group of midtown Manhattan properties. Four of these are on the west side in the area which Mr. Day believes is destined to benefit greatly from the subways now proposed or under construction.

The property at 860 Eighth Avenue between Fifty-first and Fifty-second Streets is only a block from the junction of the Eighth Avenue and Fifty-third Street subways. This property is at present improved with a four-story and cellar brownstone front building containing a store and three apartments. Another property to be sold in this neighborhood consists of two brick business buildings at 135 and 137 West Fifty-second Street between Sixth and Seventh Avenues.

Another property offered which should ultimately benefit from the east and west expansion of the city is a four-story and cellar brick building with store and six apartments at 615 Eleventh Avenue between Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Streets.

One block from Central Park and the new Eighth Avenue subway is 103 West Seventy-second Street adjoining the corner of Columbus Avenue, a four-story and basement brownstone front building.

On the east side, the forthcoming auction offers a small property at 22 East Seventy-eighth Street between Fifth and Madison Avenues in the heart of the city's most exclusive residential section.

This is a four-story brick and brownstone front residence containing thirteen rooms and five baths. Two properties are offered on Lexington Avenue in the Grand Central Zone just south of the Chrysler and Chanin Buildings and the Commodore Hotel.

These properties are a five-story remodeled multi-family building containing five apartments at 336 Lexington Avenue adjoining the northwest corner of Thirty-ninth Street; and a three-story and basement brownstone front dwelling at 321 Lexington Avenue. Another Lexington Avenue property to be sold is a four-story brownstone front business building with three stores at the southwest corner of Lexington Avenue and 105th Street.

NEGLECTED SECTION SUITABLE FOR HOMES

Building Possibilities in the Area Between Gramercy Park and Murray Hill.

A neglected section of the city which seems to offer excellent advantages for modern residential development, according to E. Irving Huntington, vice president of Richard C. Hollyday & Co., is that between Gramercy Park, Murray Hill, Fourth and Third Avenues.

"A glance at the map of Manhattan will show the proximity of this hitherto neglected section to what are among the most important commercial structures in New York," says Mr. Huntington. "The New York Life Insurance Company building occupies the block between Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Streets, Madison and Fourth Avenues, and the Metropolitan Tower overlooks Madison Square at Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has also announced its intention of erecting a 100-story structure between Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Streets, on the east side of the square, and demolition of the buildings fronting on Fourth Avenue has actually begun. There is also the Empire State Building, now being constructed on the site of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Fifth Avenue between Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Streets, which will be the tallest building in the world and provide for the occupancy of 25,000 persons.

"These enormous structures will house tens of thousands of employes and executives, many of whom will wish to live within a reasonable distance of their offices and who will desire to eliminate as far as possible the necessity of traveling on the overcrowded surface cars, subway or elevated.

"The section between Gramercy Park and Murray Hill is exceptionally well located as regards transit facilities. There are stations of the east side subway at Twenty-third, Twenty-eighth and Thirty-third Streets. The Third Avenue elevated stops at Twenty-third, Twenty-eights and Thirty-fourth Streets, and there are surface cars on Fourth, Lexington and Third Avenues.

"This district offers an exceptional opportunity to builders."

Darien in National Realty Body.

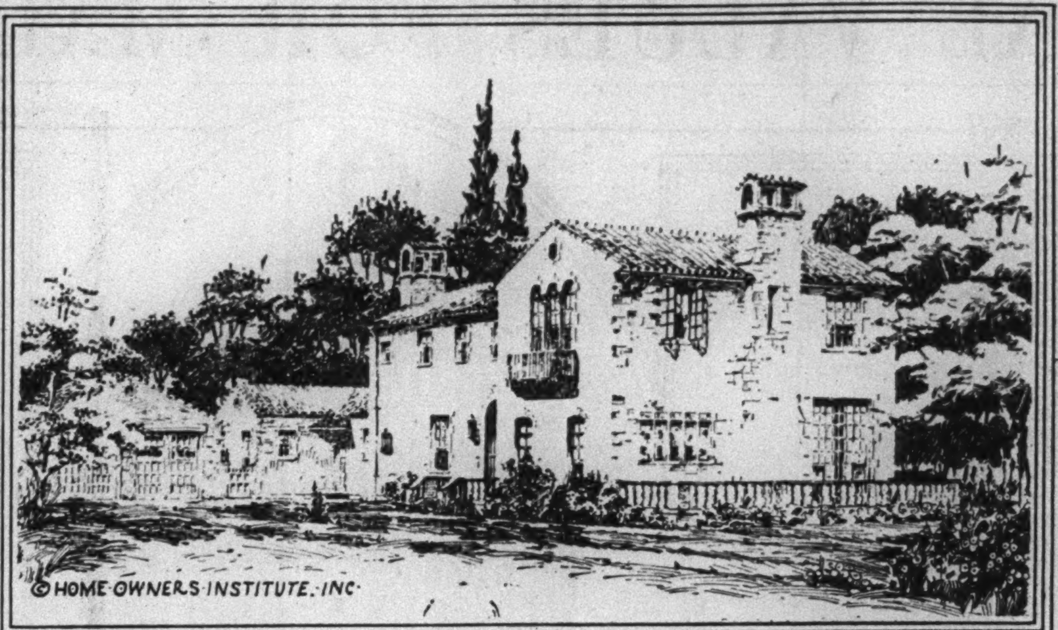
The Darien (Conn.) Real Estate Board has joined the National Association of Real Estate Boards. The Wildwood (N. J.) board has been reinstated to membership. Directors of the association have approved the consolidation of the Yonkers and Westchester boards, the former body to be known as the Yonkers Chapter of the Westchester Realty Board.

MODERN COLORINGS ACCENT THE SPANISH TRADITIONS OF THIS HOUSE DESIGN

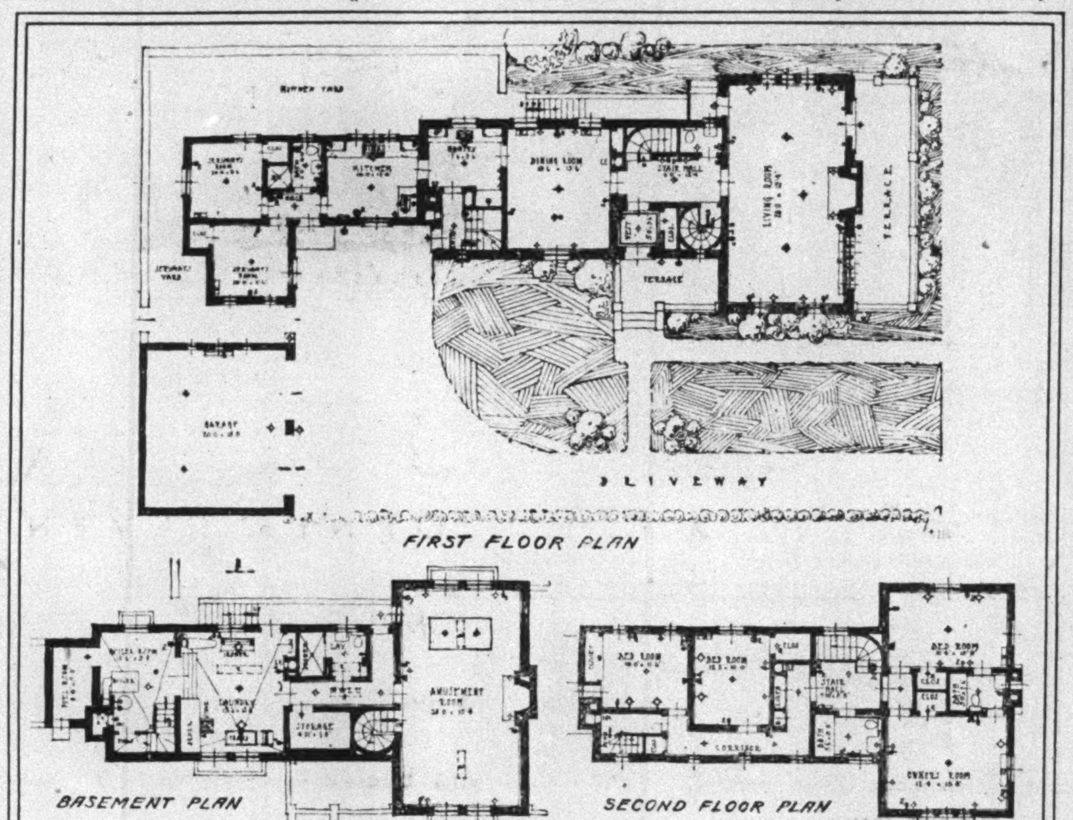
Belfry-like chimneys rise well above the roofline of this unusual house as if they were towers. This note, reminiscent of the Spanish mission architecture of Lower California, is only one among several details which accent the Spanish feeling of the entire house.

In the belfries which inspired them, bells would have tolled a welcome to service or a warning against attack. Covered with small roofs of their own these simulated belfries serve the utilitarian purpose of preventing heavy winds from sweeping down the chimney and spoiling the open fire. Before the days of modern dampers such a covering was extremely useful, for rain and snow easily found their way into the enormous flues. Flues are smaller now, yet an important point in construction is the measurement of the chimney top openings which must be at least equal in area to the flues which come up through the chimney. Otherwise a "choked' fire might result, sending unpleasant smoke into the room.

Triple arched windows opening out upon an iron balcony bespeak the romance of old Spain. Yet the colorings of this balcony and the other metal work upon the house, notably the steel casement windows, may well be of a vivid modern hue. No longer is it necessary to paint all wrought iron black. In a house such as this one a vivid orange or Chinese red would be in keeping with the most modern trend of exterior decoration. This brilliant hue against the neutral gray of natural stone or plaster walls lends accenting notes of color which fully harmonize with the reds and tans of the half-rounded clay tile roof.



Expanding the House as Family and Budget Increases Is a Possibility of This Unusual Design, for the Rear One-Story Wing Containing Servants' Quarters May Be Constructed at a Later Date if Desired. Designed by Gordon F. Street, Architect, of Santa Fé, N. M., This House Exhibits a Spanish Atmosphere in Line and Details. It Won an Award in the Rocky Mountain Regional Contest of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition Conducted by Home Owners' Institute.



An Owner's Suite of Two Bedrooms With Bath Between Them Is a Unique Characteristic of the Floor Plan of This House of Seven Main Rooms, Two Baths and Two Lavatories, With a Wing at the Rear for Servants. Entertainment in Its Formal Aspects Is Possible in the Large Living Room, While More Active and Informal Parties Will Be Held in the Equally Large Amusement Room in the Basement. Fuel Delivery Is Facilitated by a Small Window in the Fuel Room Through Which Coal and Wood May Be Passed.

Designed by Gordon F. Street, architect, of Santa Fe, N. M., this house won a $500 award in the Rocky Mountain States regional contest of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition conducted by Home Owners' Institute. This region comprised the States of Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, Arizona and New Mexico.

The terrace with its formal balustrade suggests that this would be an ideal house for the small suburban town rather than for building in the open country. This balustrade, which is repeated at the entrance door, is classic in detail. Like the Georgian Colonial houses which had more formal entrances when built within the town itself, this modern home finds its best setting near other houses.

Stone and Stucco Wings.

Stone and stucco make for an excellent combination in this structure, the front wing being of the first named material and the rear wing of the stucco. Old houses were often plastered over the stone. Hence this combination will be an appropriate one.

Expansion with family requirements and increased funds is quite possible in this house. In case servants' rooms are not necessary in the beginning, the size of the house could be curtailed by not building the rear one-story wing. The present pantry would then be the kitchen and could be enlarged if desired. The door which now leads into the kitchen would either lead outdoors or would become a window, for a rear entry is provided even when the servants' wing is left unbuilt.

Only a minimum of frame work is required around steel casement windows in an opening in a masonry wall. Since there will be so little trim the suggestion is made that the sash of the steel casements be painted a gay color. Under certain circumstances the owner may wish to introduce an awning over the terrace facing toward the street, thus adding pleasing color and design to the house façade.

An interesting informality is apparent in the street front of the house. The plane of the front wall surface is broken by the chimney which projects out a little off centre. Variation in the windows which light the living room still further emphasize this informality. At one side is a row of five leaded casements, and on the other is a huge opening with a door in the centre flanked by a casement sash. It is probable that this will be set six or eight inches in from the face of the wall for protection against the weather.

A Chimney Window.

On the upper floor of this street front the chimney is pierced by a narrow window, the extreme depth of the window reveal giving a deep shadow line at this point. Flues come up at either side of this little window. Windows equi-distant from the outside corners of the house lend balance.

The entrance side of the house shows a still different style of window spacing with a triple arched opening on the second floor occupying the most prominent place. Segmental arches over the first floor windows are balanced by the full round arch of the main door.

The doorway itself is typically Spanish in type. The door is made up of fifteen square panels, the fanlight over it filling the arch. This upper section may be of decorative wrought iron backed either by glass or masonry depending on whether the floor level within will permit an opening to the full height.

Lanterns at either side of the entrance combine an ancient tradition with a modern usefulness, for although their design simulates the old, the fuel which they use is the most modern. They are, of course, electric lanterns. A grill with protective iron work lights the service stair.

Restricted space in metropolitan suburban areas leads most home builders to build upon comparatively narrow plots. This makes it necessary that the entrance door be placed at the side of the house in this design. A certain amount of privacy from the street is thus afforded. It is increased by a little terrace at the entrance door, the front yard enclosed by house and garage on two sides, and a hedge or bank of shrubbery along the lot line.

A gateway ties garage and house together as a complete composition. Roofed in the same material as the house itself, the garage thus appears to be another small wing. It is large enough to shelter two cars. The doors at its entrance may be of the type which swing up over head. Operated by either hand or motor, such doors are entirely out of the way when the garage is open.

Sunshine All Day Long.

The unusually large living room occupies an entire wing. It measures twenty-eight feet by fifteen. Light enters it from four sides. On Summer days any prevailing breeze from east, west, north or south may be enticed into it through doors or windows facing these various points of the compass. In Winter, sunshine may light the room all during the day. The open terrace affords a still greater sense of space, especially in warm weather.

Two exits from this room are provided, one onto the terrace and the other into the garden at the side, which may, of course, be further extended if the house is built upon a larger plot. The chimney already noted from the street front contains a large fireplace so that the visitor is immediately impressed by its magnificance on entering the room.

"The designer considers a house as being both public and private and has attempted to provide privacy in the private portions and yet show consideration for entertainment which must be a part of the domestic operation," Mr. Street says in his description of the house. An amusement room in the basement supplements the entertainment possibilities of the living room. This is reached by a circular staircase which leads directly from the first floor stair hall to the amusement room, making it unnecessary to pass through laundry or boiler room.

So vast is this room in size that players will find themselves entirely unrestricted when they assemble around the large billiard table. At the same time other activities may be going on in other portions of the room. The open fire, for instance, will be a favorite gathering spot for those who like to exchange experiences. Athletic equipment will also find its place in this room, and when exercise has been unusually violent the shower just outside in the lavatory will prove very convenient.

Young sons in the family, and father too, will enjoy early morning exercise in this lower section of the house, following it with an invigorating shower. This basement shower, used at such times, will leave the baths on the upper floors free for other members of the family.

Folks may be brought into this room from outside, for a door opens out upon an areaway and steps lead upward to the grade level. A floor of tile or flagging will probably be used here and will withstand the rough usage which lively activity may give it. Side walls finished in rough troweled plaster would be in keeping with such a floor. The ceiling will probably be covered with an insulating board to mimimize the passage of the noise which will be natural to the use of this room up to the floor above.

Storage Room for Games.

Game tables, screens, storm shutter doors, and other occasional articles may be kept in the storage room in the basement. Considerable space is devoted to the well equipped laundry where all the operations necessary to keeping the family in clean clothes and linens may be performed. Washer, ironer, ironing board, trays, and dryer are provided. On fine days the laundress finds an outside drying yard conveniently located near the head of stairs which lead up to grade level from the laundry.

The boiler room contains the enamel jacketed boiler, a water heater, and the combustion chamber of the incinerator. Coal and wood are kept in the fuel room, a window being provided to facilitate delivery. A tool chest under the service stairs accommodates the family screw drivers, wrenches and hammers.

This service stair leads up to the rear entry. Here we find the pantry between dining room and kitchen. Electric refrigerator is situated close to the dining room door so that butter and frozen desserts are taken from it just before serving. Silver and glassware will be washed in the pantry sink and put away in the cabinets which flank either side of it.

A dining room measuring 15 feet 6 inches by 13 feet 6 inches ensures ample floor space for seating the average family at table with comfort. Radiators under two windows suggest shelves for plants over them or window seats. In one corner an opportunity for the display of colorful china is given by a series of shelves or a built-in ornamental closet. Near it is the opening to the laundry chute down which soiled linens are tossed.

Windows, exactly opposite, give cross ventilation and ample natural light to the kitchen. This room measures 10 by 12 feet. Cabinets for storage are placed on either side of the sink under the window. An additional service cabinet might be placed on the long wall. Or this space may be equipped with a folding dining set of table and benches, so that informal family meals may be served here. When servants are employed, such a nook will be an appropriate and convenient spot for their own meals after they have served the family.

Comfortable Servants' Quarters.

Two servants' rooms with a bath between them promise to be of help to the suburbanite in solving the servant problem which is sometimes dependent upon good living quarters. A shower is provided in the bath in place of the usual tub. Large closets and sufficient air and light promise further comforts for the occupants.

The winders of the stairway to the second floor are lighted by a window over the stairhall. Four bedrooms and two baths divide the space of this floor. According to the architect, "the front wing of the second floor comprises the owner's suite and provides a bath accessible to both rooms of the suite. The other second floor bath is accessible to both bedrooms as well as the first floor."

The service stair also leads to the second floor and is cut off from the living portion by a separate door. This passage way contains a hopper door to the incinerator flue making it unnecessary to carry the drooping flowers, old magazines, and newspapers to the cellar. Like the soiled laundry they reach the basement by chute.

Cross ventilation is provided in all bedrooms except the centre one. Here, however, the principle of cross ventilation is easily obtained, for the door opening into the corridor may be left open without danger or accident, since it opens into the room, not out into the hall.

Arthur Bates Lincoln, consulting architect, estimates that the 43,400 cubic feet of the complete house and garage may be constructed in the neighborhood of New York City for approximately $26,000. It is estimated that if servants' wing and kitchen are left for building until a later date, thereby reducing the cubage about 5,000 cubic feet, this cost may be reduced about $3,000.

Information as to cost and when blueprint working drawings and specifications ready to build from will be available, can be obtained by addressing Small Homes Bureau, care of The New York Times. Please refer to Plan No. 51.

MORTGAGE CONDITIONS.

W. M. Stevens Sees Steady Improvement in Good Securities.

A slow but sure improvement in mortgage security sales is seen by Weld M. Stevens, vice-president of the Continental Mortgage Guarantee Company.

"This is a healthy condition in the real estate and mortgage securities market," Mr. Stevens says, "and if it obtains during the next few months we may look for conservative investments in much larger amounts. An increasing demand from the thoughtful investor will, in due time, manifest itself for securities that will return an assured income without danger of depreciation of principal.

"The increasing volume of building credits moving into the mortgage market, as indicated in the recently published survey by the National Building Survey Conference, presages increased activity in the construction field. In New York City and its environs, building mortgage funds offered on a conservative basis, are becoming more available."

ROAD PROGRAMS AID ACTIVITY IN SUBURBS

More Than $4,500,000 in Budget for 1931 Parkway Improvements.

Highway improvement programs in suburban areas are having a far-reaching effect on the growth of residential sections near Manhattan. Experience of recent years in Westchester leads to the belief that the proposed improvement of Central Avenue from Tuckahoe Road to the Greenburgh Township line should foster activity on that route, says Maurice Goodman, managing director of Hartsdale Fells.

"Appropriation of $635,000 is asked for the Central Avenue work and the matter was referred to the Committee on Budgets and Appropriations this week by the Board of Supervisors," Mr. Goodman points out. "The county engineering department, in submitting its request explained that this important highway will have a uniform width of sixty feet from Tuckahoe Road to the Greenburgh line, paved with concrete and provided with a drainage and storm sewer system.

"The work is scheduled to get under way in 1931. At present Central Avenue is being similarly improved at a cost of $500,000 from Yonkers Avenue to Tuckahoe Road and following the completion of the stretch from Tuckahoe Road to Greenburgh line, now proposed, will be equally improved for the remaining distance from the Greenburgh line to White Plains. Hartsdale Fells has experienced benefits arising from the improvements under way on the first stretch of Central Avenue and the new program, announced this week, is expected to further activity in this section. While the remaining stretch of Central Avenue from the Greenburgh line to White Plains is already well paved, the improvement program will nevertheless embrace this strip, bringing it up to a width uniform with the balance of the highway and giving residents of this region a splendid arterial route from White Plains to New York City. It is anticipated that rezoning plans now in the making will create new business and apartment sections along Ceneral Avenue, and the completion of the program should witness a vast change in the entire territory served by the highway.

"The new appropriations sought this week by the Park Commission reflect renewed activity which may be expected in many sections of the county where road and parkway improvements are asked for the near future. The 1930 parkway program for 1931 constructions as referred to the Committee on Budgets and Appropriations probably will reach $4,525,000. Of this sum $1,500,000 is scheduled to go to the Saw Mill River Parkway, $665,000 to Croton Point Park, $301,000 for the Cross Country Parkway, $215,000 for Saxon Woods Park and $153,000 for Glen Island Park."

It is being sold to satisfy a judgment of $68,618.33, costs and allowances amount to $515.25, and the taxes, assessments and water rates, $5,826.57. The sale will be held in the Bronx salesroom, at noon on Tuesday.

Tomorrow Mr. Murphy will sell the vacant plot, 200 by 206, on the north side of Haviland Avenue, 189 feet west of Zerega Avenue, running through to Powell Avenue.

Additional sales on Tuesday include the five-story apartment house at 1,344 University Avenue; plot 100 by 120 on the north side of Gun Hill Road; the plot 50 by 100 on the west side of Bryant Avenue, 200 feet south of Lafayette Avenue, and in the Vesey Street room the premises 548 West 114th Street, a five-story tenement.

On Wednesday he will sell at 56 Vesey the Paul Jones Apartment House at 220 Wadsworth Avenue, a six-story building; 159-161 West Eighty-first Street, two three-story buildings and in the Bronx the premises 3,548-3,560 Third Avenue, formerly occupied by the David Mayer Brewing Company, and 2,105 Burr Avenue, a six-story brick building.

NEW BROADWAY LOFTS.

Ten-Story Building Is Going Up at Twenty-ninth Street.

Construction has been started on a ten-story loft and store building at the southwest corner of Broadway and Twenty-ninth Street on a plot 133 by 106 feet leased for a long term of years by Harold E. Wittemann from Henry Gilsey. Shampan & Shampan, the architects, estimate the cost at $750,000.

The façade of the building will be in modernistic style, the first story of granite and limestone and the remainder of ivory face brick and terra cotta. Wallach Brothers and Warendorf, florist, have leased the street floor stores.

Building at Sunshine City.

Charles H. Reis, developer of Sunshine City at Woodridge, N. J., announces that the southwest corner of Valley Boulevard and Windsor Road has been purchased by Scarnecchia & Co., builders, for improvement with a two-story building, containing stores and apartments. A four-store building is being erected by Bernard Nelson on the northwest corner of Windsor Road and the boulevard.

Talk on Building Management.

Henry J. Foster, manager of the 195 Broadway Corporation, will speak Wednesday evening at the third session of the building management course being conducted at Columbia University under the direction of Charles F. Merritt, executive secretary of the Building Managers and Owners' Association. His topic will be "Cleaning Service in Office Buildings."

MANY FAMILIES LIVE IN REAR TENEMENTS

Report Shows 10,023 Persons Occupy Such Places on the Lower East Side.

FREE RENT IN CITY HOUSES

Survey Lists 433 Old Houses on Interior Lots—Vacancies Are Increasing.

While the number of occupants of rear houses on the lower east side is constantly decreasing there still are 1,955 families living in apartments in 433 buildings erected on interior lots in that section of Manhattan, according to statistics compiled by the East Side Chamber of Commerce. Some of the data has been turned over to the State Board of Housing with the idea that the figures might be incorporated in the next report which the board makes to Governor Roosevelt.

"Although it is true that almost 50,000 persons lived in these rear houses twenty-five years ago and that number has been reduced materially in recent years, it is surprising to know that there are still 10,023 persons housed in these old structures," says Joseph Platzker, secretary of the chamber, in his report. "Many of these buildings are more than fifty years old and stand in defiance of progress and public health in the area from Fourteenth Street to Roosevelt Street, between Chrystie and Goerck Streets."

Rentals usually are from $6 to $10 a room monthly, although a few bring only $2 to $4 a room, and a small number rent for as much as $20 to $25 a room, the report indicates. The largest number is in the $10 class, with 689 families paying that sum, and the second largest in the $8 group, where 391 families reside. Eighty-six families occupy quarters renting for $6 and 184 pay $7 a room. There are 181 families paying $11 or $12.

There are seventy-three tenants living rent free in rear houses in Chrystie and Forsyth Streets owned by the city, and the same number in that district paying $2 to $4 a room in privately owned buildings.

"Vacancies in this type of housing are mounting steadily," the report adds. "While less than a score of new families, mostly from industrial towns in New Jersey and mining towns in Pennsylvania, entered these buildings last year, several times that number sought residence elsewhere.

"Most of the buildings were constructed in the late '60s, '70s and '80s to house a rising tide of immigration, and the proportion of these which have changed hands is much less than those without, rear dwellings. Most of them are owned free of mortgages because lending institutions have been loath in recent years to place their funds on such properties. A chart of ownership shows that many are in the hands of wealthy New Yorkers and estates.

Many Owned by Estates.

"Manhattan residents control 147 of the houses; estates own 74, missionary societies and churches 7, and Brooklyn residents 42. Only 92 were found to be in the hands of persons living in the lower east side. Seventy are owned by women.

"Sixty-three of the houses were reported closed and 28 occupied by caretakers; 88, or more than 20 per cent, were less than 50 per cent rented. Eighty-one were found to be fully occupied.

"The largest number is found on Third Street, where 27 such buildings with 124 families were listed; the second largest number was on Forsyth Street, where 20 rear buildings house 108 families. Third place went to Twelfth Street, with 16 houses and 96 families. Other streets with 10 or more were Second, Fourth, Eleventh, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Cherry, Chrystie, Clinton, Eldridge, Hester, Ludlow, Madison, Monroe, Pitt, Orchard, Ridge and Stanton Streets.

"Practically all of the tenants are foreign-born. Thirty-five per cent were found to be Italians, 22 per cent Poles, 16 per cent Russians and 9 per cent Jews. Most of the others are Greeks, Syrians, Turks, Armenians, Rumanians, Serbs, Irish and Swedes.

"The average market value of the house furnishings was estimated at $25. Most of the heads of families are unskilled laborers or small tradesmen. The customs and manners of their native country still prevail to a large extent, and coffee houses of the neighborhood draw a considerable part of their patronage from these tenants. Many are illiterate, and in Russian-Polish and Italian districts foreign letter readers still call monthly to read and answer mail."

SPORTING CENTRE ON CAROLINA COAST

Eight Hundred Acres Purchased by Henry C. Phipps Near Cape Hatteras.

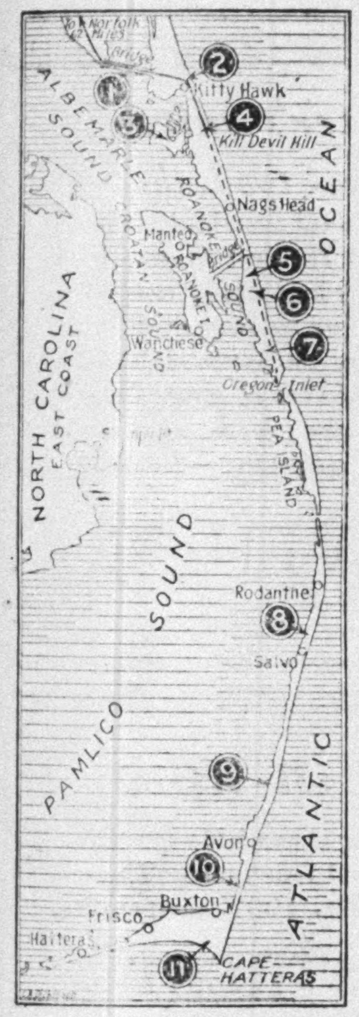
FRONTS ON PAMLICO SOUND

Hunting and Fishing Preserves Being Developed on Large Oceanfront Area.

That the North Carolina coast is "coming into its own" as a sportsman's paradise is evidenced by the many large sales that have been made recently, the latest one being the purchase of 800 acres with eight miles of sound and ocean frontage to Henry C. Phipps of Sutton Place, who purchased the property from the Lewis Development Company, which controls several thousands of acres of ocean frontage in Dare County in North Carolina just a short distance north of Cape Hatteras.

It is understood that Mr. Phipps will erect a lodge and yacht landing on the Pamlico Sound frontage as several other prominent New Yorkers have, who recently purchased large tracts in this vicinity.

Just south of the Phipps property, adjacent to the village of Hatteras, is the Cape Hatteras Club, while to the north and near the bridge, now in construction from the Norfolk (Va.) road to Kitty Hawk, are the hunting and fishing preserves of Jules Day, comprising 1,000 acres; Charles Frenauff of Doherty & Co., about 120 acres, and a large tract controlled by a syndicate of officials of the Otis Elevator Company.



1.—New bridge across Albemarle Sound connecting road to Norfolk with new ocean boulevard.
2.—Virginia Dare shores, where new boulevard starts.
3.—Seven hundred acres owned by Frank Stick of Asbury Park, N. J.
4.—Kitty Hawk acreage leased to new school for aviation and gliders.
5.—One hundred twenty acres sold to Charles A. Frueauff of New York.
6.—One thousand acres purchased by Jules W. Day, president of Corn Stalk Products Company.
7.—Two thousand acres purchased by syndicate headed by W. B. Perine of New York for private club.
8.—Eight hundred acres sold to S. G. Coggin of Roslyn, L. I.
9.—Four hundred acres leased to club headed by Harry M. Belford of Morristown, N. J.
10.—Eight hundred acres purchased last week by Henry C. Phipps of New York for private fishing and game preserve.
11.—One thousand acres leased to club headed by Frank Stick of Asbury Park.

P. B. Pray, secretary of the Lewis Development Company, in commenting upon the activity of this section, said: "It is not hard to find the reason in this interest in North Carolina. Every year sees an increase in scarcity of suitable property for the pursuit of such sports as fishing, gunning and other allied branches.

"Values of near-by property have increased so tremendously in the past few years that their cost alone would be prohibitive even if they enjoyed the advantages of game in abundance.

"In New Jersey much of the desirable property bordering on Barnegat Bay—once the mecca of all unattached duck shooters—has passed into the hands of clubs and private game preserves and I am confident that the next few years will see an unprecedented demand for property in this section of the country."

HOMES AT LAURELTON.

Developers Erecting New Group of 105 Dwellings.

A new group of 105 single-family brick homes is being built by Laurelton Homes, Inc., a division of the Interstate Building Corporation, on the old Laurelton golf course property, Long Island. More than 1,500 homes have been constructed there within the past two years, being about 60 per cent of the total originally planned for the development.

Improved methods of Winter building have enabled the developers to carry forward their construction plans throughout the year. Several large mortgage companies have placed first loans aggregating $525,000 on the new group of residences.

Among the features of the houses are parquet floors, open fireplaces, enclosed sun porch, floored attic, textured walls and tiled kitchen. Roofs are of tile.

COMPETITION EVIL IN BUILDING TRADE

Bidding by Too Many Contractors Often Hampers Best Results.

SYSTEM LEADS TO WASTE

Architect Should Have Privilege of Selecting Best Contractor, Says J. H. Hammond.

Closer industrial cooperation between architects and contractors to eliminate waste and promote higher standards is advocated by G. Herrick Hammond of Chicago, president of the American Institute of Architects. In voicing this opinion he points out that unrestrained competition is one of the great evils in the building industry today.

"The prevailing system in this country of selecting a contractor by competitive bidding often fails to accomplish the result for which such competitions are held, namely, to secure the best contractor to do the work," Mr. Hammond said. "When competitive bids are taken on an important building, general contractors are selected to bid, and as far as the architect is concerned an effort is made to select men as near equal in standing and qualifications as possible.

"But other contractors, not invited, bring all the pressure and influence they can organize to secure an opportunity to bid, thereby increasing the number beyond the desires of the architect and beyond the number which would give each bidder a reasonable chance to win. Worst of all, they inject into the list men who may not be properly qualified to do the work.

A Building Evil.

"Unrestrained competition in the building industry is an evil. Many evils of the industry are the result of the unfair competition that comes through the necessity of accepting bids from contractors of unequal standing and ability; this problem must be solved by the contractors.

"It is obvious that in the construction world the products sold in competition are made after they are sold. When a merchant sells a pair of shoes in competition, the buyer sees the shoes and can choose just as good or as bad a make of shoes as he will stand for or pay for. When the owner buys the construction of a building in competition, the competition is all over when the sale is made, thereafter the buyer, having bought on a promise or on a reputation receives in return an article which is no better than he or the architect will accept, or the craft pride and good faith of the builder will produce.

"It is that essential failure of ordinary competition, when applied to building construction, that must be taught to the people who pay for the building—the owners—and it has to be taught to them by competent architects and competent contractors working together in a fine spirit of cooperation.

"I believe, and most architects, I am sure, will agree with me, that the ideal way to construct a building is to select a contractor who by his experience, his ability as a builder, his organization, his equipment and his financial standing is best qualified. The building operation is thus put in the hands of the architect and contractor, both working in a professional capacity for the best interest of the owner.

Chicago Experience.

"At one time in Chicago a survey and estimate was made as to just how much competitive bidding cost the building industry. This estimate resulted in showing that on an average 3 per cent was the cost of securing estimates and selecting a general contractor. Last year the total cost of buildings erected in the Chicago district exceeded $300,000,000, which, multiplied by 3 per cent, gives the large sum of approximately $10,000,000 as the cost of estimating in Chicago for that year.

"As each contractor secures only a small proportion of the contracts on which he makes estimates, a great portion of this expense is wasted, but at the same time is added to the overhead expense of each concern involved. This overhead expense is paid for by every owner in the city who erects a building. This lays a heavy tax on the owner.

"A large portion of this waste may be eliminated if an agreement can be reached between architects and contractors to use the quantity survey system in cities large enough to warrant the establishment of such survey bureaus, in accordance with a report and recommendation on quantity survey by the joint committee of the American Institute of Architects, the Associated General Contractors of America and the American Engineering Council."

Massapequa Transit Facilities.

The growth of Massapequa Park, L. I., and other South Shore communities has been fostered by expanding transit and highway facilities, according to Brady, Cryan & Colleran. Merrick Road, Sunrise Highway and the Southern State Parkway serve motor traffic in that area. Railroad service has been expanded and new subways into this territory are projected. The Fitzmaurice flying field is near by and water traffic is served by Great South Bay.

How and Why to Buy A Park Avenue Apartment Out of Income

The apartments in 1220 Park Avenue at 95th Street, facing east on Park Avenue and south overlooking Squadron "A" Armory, are now offered for sale under a new plan of payments out of income, giving full ownership at the end of five years with only maintenance to pay thereafter.

For example:

Corner apartment "B," 12 rooms and 4 baths on the 8th floor

Selling Price	$54,000
One-third payable in three installments during construction	18,000

Balance payable over a period of five years from completion at 5% interest. No finance charge.

The annual payments on account of principal will be $7200 plus average interest of $900.

The estimated annual maintenance is $5886.

This apartment would rent for $9600. a year. Estimated maintenance, plus interest on the entire purchase price, $8586. Therefore there is a real saving over rental of $1014 a year in addition to the convenience of buying out of income.

1220 PARK AVENUE
NORTHWEST CORNER 95TH STREET

Other apartments from 7 to 14 rooms, simplex, duplex, many with terraces, may be bought under this same plan.

NEW JERSEY. NEW JERSEY.

PROPERTY on the Jersey Plaza of the new Hudson River Bridge is PRACTICALLY New York Property ... joined to Manhattan by the most expensive bridge and highway in the world ... in essentially the same relation that Borough Hall, Brooklyn, property bears to Manhattan.

Isn't it good sense to assume that if business and apartment locations on the New York Plaza are being quoted at $80,000 per lot property on the Jersey Plaza that MUST inevitably be improved with apartment and business buildings ought to be worth at least one-third as much ... instead of $800 to $2,250, our current prices, for property about 5 minutes by motor from Manhattan?

REMEMBER ... these lots are right ON the Jersey Plaza ... not merely NEAR it. For this reason, though it may seem fantastic now, we KNOW that every $1,000 invested today should yield an unusually large profit by 1932. The story of what happened when the Philadelphia-Camden Bridge opened in 1926, skyrocketing lot prices from $4,000 to $75,000, is ample proof of what we can expect.

We can prove EVERY statement we make and appeal especially to hard-headed conservative investors in Business and Apartment Sites.

"RESULTS EXCEEDED EXPECTATIONS BY FAR"

THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Through The New York Times Real Estate pages we have been able to lease 50% of the space that we recently advertised. We obtained a very reputable concern in the hosiery business, who assumed the balance of our client's lease which terminates six years hence.

May we add that the results obtained from this advertising exceeded our original expectations by far. We obtained a good many leads which may mean additional business for our firm in the near future.

Martin M. Urband,

More real estate advertising of all kinds is published in The New York Times than in any other newspaper in the world. In 1929 The Times printed 3,585,304 agate lines, 1,531,508 lines more than any other New York newspaper.

HOME FURNISHING IN MODERN STYLE

Nation-Wide Survey Proposed to Determine Present-Day Trends.

AIM FOR COZY ATMOSPHERE

Decorator Stresses Harmony in Colors, Lighting and Furniture Equipment.

A nation-wide survey to determine the present trend in home furnishings and the style consciousness of the average woman in relation to articles that go into her home has been started at the request of a group of manufacturers.

The study will be carried out in twelve cities and will begin in Syracuse.

"Styles in housing and furnishings change the same as they do in clothing," said Jac Lessman, president of Jac Lessman, Inc., of Park Avenue, who furnished and decorated the Hotel Delmonico and several other large hotels. "To overspend in furnishing a room by filling it with odds and ends pretty in themselves, perhaps, but neither useful nor intrinsically valuable toward creating a decorative unit, is being guilty of bad taste and of having achieved what is righteously dubbed by the trades 'a decorator's delight.'

"But please, have you a chair one can sit in?

"It reminds me of the old story about the ornate towels in the bathroom. Everybody is afraid to use them.

"However, if a careful study is made of every room, giving due consideration to its size, lighting and furnishings, the interior of the home can be welded into one harmonious unit.

"In furnishing the Hotel Delmonico apartments I had one thing in mind, namely, to create a home atmosphere in arranging the furnishings instead of a stereotyped set-up as seen in most hotels. In addition to this I attempted to handle each apartment individually and not to repeat the decorative scheme throughout.

"In this way people feel that their apartment was furnished by a decorator to meet with their personal taste. In furnishing a living room of the size typical of most apartment hotels, I do not think that enough stress is placed on the comfort and utility of each piece that goes into the room.

"Because of its size, one is limited in the number of pieces that can go in the room, and it is, therefore, necessary that every piece be spotted with a definite thought as to the purpose it will serve toward making the living room comfortable, practical and decorative. Where the living room can have only a few seating pieces, every one of them should be comfortable, but not to a degree where it would cause a seated guest to lose his poise or have a tendency to make him lazy.

"There should be, however, two very comfortable lounging pieces to serve just this purpose, for the people living in the apartment. When selecting wall colors for medium-sized living rooms I believe that it is better to work with neutral and light backgrounds, which will give the apartment a spacious and airy appearance.

"Tinted walls as seen in many apartments are crude and rather offensive, executed as they often are by inartistic and necessarily low-priced painters, and they succeed in creating too much vibration in the nervous system of an individual, and in many instances upset the decorative scheme by clashing with the furnishings of the room.

"Nevertheless, tinted walls if carefully treated would add richness and interest and tend to create a more harmonious decorative scheme. In arranging the furnishings for a living room of ordinary size the proper distribution of pieces should be given considerable thought. One should have in mind that if every chair in the room were properly placed and occupied, the people would be well distributed and would be facing each other.

"Much thought should be given to the size of the various pieces of furniture in relation to each other and see that one piece does not overpower the other, or better, that one grouping does not overpower the other.

"In selecting upholstery materials, the size of the piece should have definite bearing on the scale of pattern and the texture of fabrics used. For instance, it would be poor taste to select a large-patterned linen frieze in heavy colors for a small occasional chair.

"Attractive and cheerful effects can be created by having all upholstered pieces in different colors, harmonizing, of course, with each other and arranged so as to get an effective and properly balanced scheme. The texture of fabrics, too, may vary with the style and utility of the chair or sofa.

"In many instances the drapery can play the part of tying together the entire color scheme in the room. It is exceedingly poor taste to have most of the pieces upholstered in the same color or in the same value of color and then have one piece covered in a bright-colored material.

"This is done many times to create what is known as an 'odd piece' and is almost always an illigitimate and 'short-cut' means of avoiding the stereotyped effect without actually creating a scheme. A properly furnished living room should show the tastes of a discriminating host.

"How often a room is destroyed decoratively and practically by improper lighting!

"The necessity for flooding the entire room with strong light is debatable, although certain circumstances and activities may necessitate it at times (for instance, the popularity of bridge, which is excellently taken care of by the innovation of the modern indirect bridge lamp). Lamplight, however, is indispensable to the cozy living room.

"A lamp properly placed can create and justify individual grouping. It can divide even a small room so subtly as to lend it a feeling of spaciousness and interesting angles which would be entirely lost without its use. However, great care must be used in the selection and placing of lamps in the room.

"Too many lamps indiscriminately used on every hand will destroy the calm of the room and give one the feeling of display. A lamp becomes a focal point in the room and should lend a decorative note by the design and color in its base and the quality and workmanship of the shade.

"In furnishing a bedroom it is most important to carefully study the size of the room before deciding what type of a bedroom suite to purchase. The size of most bedrooms in apartment hotels should limit one to the selection of a simple and refined suite. In the small room a very ornate and necessarily more pretentiously scaled suite would almost always show bad judgment in selection, even though the suite were in itself quite handsome. Beautiful effects may be obtained from unusual veneers, and it is not necessary to get overcarved pieces where expensive furniture is desired.

"The better manufacturers today seem to have coped with the apartment hotel situation and are making very fine suites properly scaled to fit in these smaller bedrooms.

"A bedroom should not be overcrowded into what might be termed compressed comfort. In many instances the bedrooms look as if every inch of space is used for lounging purposes; easy chairs, chaise longue, pillows covering up every bit of floor space and thereby detracting from the beauty of any individual piece. To my mind, it is best not to drape the window in the more elaborate styles using festoons, &c., as one never has too much air or sunlight living in the city.

"Richly textured, beautifully colored fabrics simply used lend elegance enough and are more in keeping with the rather unpretentious design of a modern apartment hotel room. Then, too, in the name of practicability, one should not select rough pile or tapestry for upholstering bedroom easy chairs or lounges where it would prove objectionable to negligee utility."

The apartment hotel is one of the most important factors in Manhattan's high-class housing situation today.

This is shown by the increase in the amount of construction that has taken place in the past couple of years.

But those who seek this class of home are very discriminating and in some cases very hard to please.

MORGAN HOMESTEAD TO BE COUNTRY CLUB

Work of transforming the old J. Pierpont Morgan estate at Cragston-on-Hudson into a country club will begin about March 1, according to officials of the Cragston Yacht and Country Club, which has acquired the estate.

More than $1,500,000 will be spent on two golf courses, polo field, tennis courts, sunken gardens, golf house, yacht and boat house and a basin for seaplanes, it was stated, as well as in remodeling the forty-room country home of the Morgans for fifty-seven years into a clubhouse of early English architecture. The same style of architecture will be used on other buildings.

The library and study of the late J. P. Morgan will be converted into a club dining room and the dining room will be used as a men's grill. Card rooms and guest rooms will be provided.

Trowbridge & Livingston are the architects, and the structural work is under the direction of the Whitney Company, which built the Morgan bank structure at Wall and Nassau Streets. Interior decoration will be executed by J. C. Demarest. A new clubhouse is contemplated in the near future.

The building committee consists of Leon C. Stowell, William Austen Sanders and Howard C. Davison.

BUILDING IN BROOKLYN.

National Cash Register's Branch on Atlantic Avenue.

An addition to the business section of Atlantic Avenue, in Brooklyn, is rising at 312-14 Atlantic Avenue, near Smith Street, where the National Cash Register Company is erecting a three-story office structure.

The building covers a plot 50 by 90 feet. The front portion of the ground floor will be used for display rooms, the remainder of the floor for general offices. The accounting machine department will occupy the second floor and the service department the third. Pliny Eves is in charge of the Brooklyn offices. Henry Gilligan & Co. acted as brokers in the purchase of the site.

MORE GLASS USED IN NEW APARTMENT

Modern Trend Is Followed in Design of Twin Beaux Arts Buildings.

SPONSORED BY ARCHITECTS

New Structures in East Forty-fourth Street Contain More Than 800 Rooms and 640 Suites.

The trend toward use of more glass in the exteriors of apartment buildings to meet a demand on the part of tenants for ample sunlight and air is illustrated in the new Beaux Arts Apartments at 307 and 309 East Forty-fourth Street, according to Colonel John Reed Kilpatrick, vice president of the New York Building Congress and vice president of the George A. Fuller Company, builders.

The structure is modernistic in design and decorations. The twin buildings were erected and are owned chiefly by architects through purchase of stock in a corporation they organized. Kenneth M. Murchison and Raymond M. Hood were the associated architects, but a score of others had a part in the plans. The buildings have been awarded the Construction Merit Prize of Building Investment for 1929.

Wide horizontal stripes of mixed colored brick have been used in the exterior walls. Mr. Hood, commenting on the design, said "These horizontal stripes of the exterior on the Beaux Arts Apartments buildings come from the fact that we made the piers between the windows horizontally of a mixed black and red selected brick—colors that will tone in with the dark values of the windows. At the same time it takes away from the waffle-like character of the usual factory design.

"The principle would have been the same if the façade had been treated vertically, but the terracing back of the upper floors, due to the New York zoning laws, gave the mass strong, horizontal lines. Developing the rest of the façade horizontally gave more repose and more of a residental character than the two Beaux Arts Apartment buildings would have had otherwise."

Main exterior entrances are modernistic in their treatment, with all metal work painted either a brilliant red, as are all windows up to the seventeenth floors, or with the natural silvery finish of chromium plate. Ground-floor one-room studio apartments each have a private front garden on the street and private front entrances.

Ground-floor lobbies are done in modernistic effect, with brown glass side walls and chromium metal trim. The elevators are modernistic in design, as are the three rooms in the restaurant, one done in modernistic reds, one in blue and one in green.

Up to the fourteenth floors both buildings consist of one-room apartments with disappearing twin or single beds. Above the thirteenth floors there are studio suites of one, two and three rooms, with balconies. All apartments have serving room or pantry facilities. There are 640 apartments in the two buildings and more than 800 rooms.

Twenty-three of New York's architects, artists, sculptors, interior decorators, builders, realty men and attorneys, all active in construction enterprises, are the owners of the entire issue of $5,250,000 of preferred stock in the Beaux Arts Apartments.

Among the stockholders in the corporation who contributed ideas in the erection of the apartments were Whitney Warren of Warren & Wetmore, architects; Chester Holmes Aldrich and William Adams Delano of Delano & Aldrich, architects; Henry F. Bultitude, interior decorator; Charles Keck, sculptor; John W. Cross of Cross & Cross, architects; William H. Compert, architect; Voorhees, Gmelin & Walker, architects; Benjamin Winster Morris of B. M. Morris & Associates, architects; Arthur H. Hawkins Jr., artist; James W. O'Connor, architect; Ernest F. Tyler, interior decorator; Charles Zeller Klauder, architect; Raymond M. Hood of Hood, Godley & Fouilhoux, architects; Kenneth M. Murchison, architect; Douglas L. Elliman and Roland Elliman of Douglas L. Elliman & Co.; William B. Symmes, attorney; William Walter Phelps, capitalist; George G. Schreiber, attorney; Huber B. Lewis, attorney; Colonel John Reed Kilpatrick and the George A. Fuller Company.

Loughman Is Re-elected.

Edward D. Loughman was re-elected chairman of the Subdividers' Division of the Long Island Real Estate Board last week. Other officers elected were Daniel J. Gleeson of Gleeson & Dolan, vice chairman; George J. Brown of the George J. Brown Organization, secretary, and William H. Door, treasurer.

MATURE WOMEN OF PERSONALITY.

Our company, which deals exclusively in real estate and real estate investments, is organizing a woman's department. This means an important earning opportunity to personable and mature women who can talk intelligently to investors about their investment problems, who can meet people easily and effectively, and who are ambitious enough to work hard and steadily for the large return which our staff is accustomed to receive.

Work of this nature, paying commissions in direct ratio to your results, is the one profession in which women can earn returns as large as men. Our highest paid representative in 1929 was a woman.

Ours is the largest and oldest organization in its field. To women who qualify it can offer important and lucrative work, in an extremely pleasant environment. Lack of specific training is not a handicap, if you have the personal qualities we are seeking. Please ask for Mrs. Husing on the 3d floor. BOYS AND YOUNG MEN WANTED.

The agency advertisements in these columns show calls for many OFFICE BOYS. The boy who responds may thus get a start on the road to SUCCESS in BUSINESS.

But every office boy may be reminded that he should succeed not only in "holding down his job," but also in getting "a raise" in pay now and then. To assure this his clerical work should at least show quickness and accuracy in ARITHMETIC, a plain, rapid HANDWRITING and correctness in SPELLING and TYPING. If he lacks these qualifications (most boys do) they could be given him in a few months of special training in the evening sessions of the

EASTMAN-GAINES SCHOOL.

If his ambitions aspire to the higher positions and better salaries paid to competent

SECRETARIES, ACCOUNTANTS, BOOKKEEPERS, STENOGRAPHERS and SALESMEN

he could be prepared in our day school for any one of these positions in a single year or less. If you want to be prepared to earn double the salary you are paid as an office boy address

WHY OUR MEN ARE HIGHLY PAID.

We always have a place in our organization for a man we can develop into a large producer—both for himself and us; previous experience in our work is not necessary; we do require aptitude, ambition and a disposition for hard work.

Our men are among the highest paid workers and biggest earners in their field; backing their climb to large commissions is the Harmon prestige, built around the successful merchandising, over a 43-year period, of some $200,000,000 worth of land in 34 cities; the high class development of the properties we sell, and the remarkably easy and appealing terms which put our offerings within reach of every investor and prospective home-owner. (Our company, today one of the oldest and largest real estate and realty investment houses in America, wrote the first instalment real estate contract ever written, in Cincinnati in 1887.)

There is a place in our organization for you if you are the type of man who does not know it all, but does know how to learn; who does not believe one can get something for nothing, but does want to turn his abilities into a large earning power; who does not want a soft snap, but is eager for opportunity.

If you are aggressive, ambitious, a good mixer and have self-confidence in the place where many men have just an inferiority complex, we want to talk with you. Please ask for Mr. Mortimer, 3d floor.

THE EQUITABLE LIFE Assurance Society of the United States wants men and women, preferably between 25 and 40, to join its selling force.

THE EQUITABLE PREFERS men and women who have had no previous insurance experience, but who have succeeded at their previous undertakings and who feel that their present jobs do not offer them a proper chance to advance; men and women who want to work for themselves and attain independence and self-reliance, and not spend the remainder of their lives working for somebody else.

SALESMANSHIP COURSES are offered by us. You may earn as you learn the business. Personal instruction and supervision will be furnished by experienced life insurance supervisors, who will help you get started.

NOT ONLY WILL you be paid a commission on the sales you make, but service renewals for several years will, in addition, be allowed on the renewal of the policies you sell, thus enabling you to build up a steady future income plus the first year's commission you receive now.

MRS. MARIE D. KLING.

A Farmhouse in an Apple Orchard.

An old New England farmhouse in a real old New England setting—in Spring countless apple trees aglow with delicate pink.

On a level tract at the very crest of a high ridge (350 feet above sea level) and on interestingly historic grounds. Lord Howe's headquarters of Revolutionary times was right across the road and the old stone walls of today are those of 100 years ago. The beauty and the invigorating atmosphere of the spot must have been appreciated by the Indians for arrow heads and all sorts of Indian relics are brought to life by a bit of searching in what seems to be an old camping ground of theirs.

The farmhouse is wonderfully attractive inside with its centre hall; its 2 living rooms bright with the sunlight from many windows and inviting with the cozy comfort of spacious rooms and not too high ceilings.

Apple trees, quince trees and every kind of fruit—grapes, strawberries, blackberries, peaches, pears, plums, raspberries, cherries, a vegetable garden with one's own asparagus bed, cucumbers, tomatoes, corn, green beans—a list of delectable good things to spur the most jaded appetite. 4 master bedrooms, sleeping porch. Garage.

A photograph will be sent free upon request.

UNPAID ESTATE TAX STOPS REALTY SALE

Executors Had Failed to Remove Liens on Broadway Property.

LEGAL QUESTIONS DEFINED

Judge Pound Holds That Buyer Was Justified in Not Completing Deal.

The Court of Appeals made a novel decision recently in setting aside an important realty transaction because the property was owned by an estate and as the inheritance taxes had not been paid by the estate they were liens against the property which made it unsalable and justified the purchaser in refusing to complete the transaction.

The suit was brought by Eva Heymann against Paul Viane, James E. Squires and Robert M. Fulton to recover a down payment and the cost of making a title search, and went to the Court of Appeals from a judgment for the plaintiff. The judgment was upheld unanimously in an opinion by Judge Pound, who said that the question involved was whether Viane had marketable title on March 23, 1926, to 816 Broadway, New York City. Viane and Squires had entered into a contract for the sale of the property to Squires on Nov. 18, 1925. The closing date was adjourned to March 23, 1926, Viane agreeing to convey the property free of all incumbrances with certain exceptions not material to the case.

On the latter date the A. T. Realty Company, Inc., as assignee of Squires, refused to take title on the ground of unpaid State and Federal inheritance taxes and a sublease. Viane bought the parcel in February, 1925, from the estate of Thomas T. Sturges, who died in 1923. The will gave the executors power of sale over all the realty, and directed that the taxes on all bequests be paid out of the residuary estate. At the time of the sale to Viane the executors had $27,582, while the total amount necessary to pay all expenses, including the taxes, was $15,063. Payment of the cash legacies, in addition, would have required the sum of $40,260. The trial court found that it was necessary to sell the property involved in the suit to make the total payments, although it was not shown that the payment was necessary for the payment of the taxes alone.

The State taxes were not paid until Dec. 13, 1926, while the last Federal inheritance payment was not made until July 9, 1926. These taxes were among the exceptions set forth in certificates of two title insurance companies. The contract of sale was subject to a lease for three years of part of the basement from May 1, 1925, to be used in the collar business, but it appeared that in November, 1925, the lessees, without the consent of Squires or the A. T. Realty Company, Inc., sublet part of the leased premises.

In his opinion, Judge Pound said: "Appellant (Viane) contends that although on the closing day of the contract the transfer tax might otherwise have been an incumbrance upon the premises, it was not a lien upon the defendant Viane's property and was not a valid objection to the taking of title for the reason that in the proper administration of the estate it was necessary for the Sturges executors to sell the property in order to realize sufficient cash with which to pay the expenses of administration, debts, taxes and specific cash legacies of his estate; that the sale was therefore made free and clear from such encumbrance and that the lien attached only to the fund realized from the sale.

"If we give Section 224 of the tax law its widest significance it merely authorizes the executor to sell, free from the lien, so much of the testator's property as will supply the necessary funds, otherwise lacking, to enable him to pay such tax. If the real estate had been specifically devised it might have been necessary to sell it to pay the taxes which were a lien on it, but here the taxes were payable out of the residuary estate. The sale was made under the discretionary power of sale in the regular course of the administration of the estate.

"The real estate herein was property transferred by testator's will and the tax remains a lien upon it until paid. No evidence indicates that the sale was effected for the purpose of enabling the executors to pay the transfer tax or was necessary for that purpose except in connection with debts, expenses of administration and legacies.

"The executors had abundant funds on hand to pay the tax, debts and expenses of administration. The testator's direction that all taxes on bequests should be paid out of the residuary estate did not release the lien of the State on specific property. As long as the tax remained unfixed and unpaid, the realty was not marketable. The doctrine of equitable conversion may not be relied on to subject property to taxation or to shift the lien of the tax from the real property transferable to the fund."

GRAMERCY PARK HOUSE.

Tall Apartment in English Tudor Type of Architecture.

Clement E. Merowit, who is erecting the apartment building at 44 Gramercy Park North, has announced the appointment of Albert B. Ashforth, Inc., as renting agents for the building. Although steel construction was only recently started, practically 20 per cent of the apartments have been rented for Fall occupancy.

The building occupies a plot on the north side of Gramercy Park, east of Lexington Avenue. Schwartz & Gross, the architects, have designed it in the style of an English manor house with gables and battlemented towers. There will be four penthouse apartments and several tower apartments with terraces.

FULLER CO. WINS SUIT ON CONTRACT

Justice Callahan Awards Judgment for $45,000 on Building Work.

OVERPAYMENT CHARGED

Court Holds That Accusations of Cedar-William Street Corporation Were Not Valid.

A legal construction of a building contract between the George A. Fuller Company and the Cedar-William Street Corporation has just been made by Supreme Court Justice Callahan in a suit by the former for a balance of $45,007 alleged to be due on which the building company claimed a lien on the property. Justice Callahan in an extended opinion gave judgment for the sum sued for with interest.

The Cedar-William Street Corporation denied owing anything, and even asserted overpayment. It also counterclaimed on the ground that the contractor had defrauded it "by means of a scheme of increasing estimate costs and by erroneously duplicating charges by inserting said items both as costs and in a certain 10 per cent allowance," and asked an accounting.

Pointing out that the contract was drawn after numerous conferences, at some of which the parties were represented by their lawyers, the court said that the defendant named architects of "apparently wide experience" who were designated as the owners' agents. "The contractor was a large construction firm and the owner's president a builder of some experience," said the court. The opinion states further:

"The provisions of the contract applicable to the disputed points were that the contractor was to furnish the labor and materials in the erection of the building in accordance with the plans and specifications. The owner agreed to pay the cost incurred by the contractor and a fixed fee of $43,000. The contractor agreed that the main work specified would not cost in excess of $836,053, including the fee of $43,000, and if it exceeded said sum the contractor was to pay the excess. The parties knew the contract covered only part of the work. In order to obtain a finished building a great deal of construction not included in the main contract was required. The original plans specified some of this additional work, but it was later omitted, with the understanding it would be ordered as alterations or extras.

"The contract provided that if alterations involving extra cost were ordered the contractor was to furnish to the architect or owner an estimate of the extra cost, and on giving an order for the extra work the amount of the guaranteed limit cost of $836,053 was to be increased by the amount of such estimate. The contractor further agreed that if certain of the work originally contemplated was later ordered the contractor was to receive no fees in addition to the $43,000 until the cost of the work contracted for, plus the contemplated extra work and the $43,000 fee, reached the sum of $960,182. The contract then provided that the contractor was to receive 'the cost to it plus 10 per cent for general conditions and a commission of 6½ per cent thereon in addition for all work in excess of $960,682 and for any and all additional work which the contractor may be called upon to perform' under contract."

Points in Dispute.

Justice Callahan said that the three main points in dispute were: Was the contractor required to segregate the cost of extras from the cost of the main work? Have the defendants established that the contractor committed fraud in intentionally overestimating the cost of the extras so that they might receive the benefit of an enlarged guaranteed limit price? What is the meaning of the provision in the contract that "the contractor shall receive the cost to it plus 10 per cent for general conditions and a commission of 6½ per cent thereon in addition for all work in excess of $960,682?" The opinion says further:

"It has been seen that the contractor was to get actual cost plus certain fees in certain contingencies; that for the main work he fixed a limit price; that the parties contemplated extras; that when extras were ordered the limit price was to be increased by the amount thereof; that a certain form of monthly accounting was required. The alterations and extras did not, nor were they intended to, await the finishing of the main work. This work was ordered as the main work progressed and it clearly was not contemplated, nor was it practical, to segregate the cost of the main work from the costs of the extras. Many items of such cost were practically indivisible. For example, if a hoist was erected to bring up materials the cost of that hoist was a proper item of charge. Could it be said that the contractor was to keep track of the quantities of materials hoisted on it that were used in the main work and the quantities used in the doing of the extras?

"I do not think that any such arrangement was ever intended. The upset or guaranteed limit price was a variable figure. It was known it would increase as the extras were ordered. The owner now complains that by submitting grossly exaggerated estimates of the cost of extras the contractor was enabled to avoid paying the excess of the cost of the main work over $830,053. Assuming that that happened, it was caused by two things, first, the contract provision that the limit price was to change each time an extra was ordered and, second, that the owner ordered the extras done without requiring a more conservative estimating of the cost of the extras.

"The contention of the owner that the contractor was to segregate the cost of the two branches of the work is, in my opinion, neither warranted by the contract nor supported by a consideration of the practical side of the job involved. In fact, it appears clearly as an afterthought. Neither the owner nor his architect ever requested it or objected to the contrary method which was consistently pursued. The testimony on the second claim of the owner, that the contractor was guilty of a fraud in that it willfully and intentionally submitted grossly excessive estimates of the cost of extras ordered, was voluminous. The owner's counsel have carefully and painstakingly reviewed this testimony. They have prepared elaborate and imposing tabulations and comparisons of the estimates involved with the subcontractors' prices."

In reaching a decision that "under all the circumstances the contract must be construed as the plaintiff contends," Justice Callahan says:

"The contract made the contractor liable for the excess if the actual cost exceeded the initial guaranteed limit plus the estimated cost of the extras. The contractor frankly conceded that it made its estimates reasonably safe. I concede that the execution of a fraudulently conceived plan to grossly exaggerate the estimates in order that the contractor might eliminate a loss would constitute a fraud, even though the representations consisted of an approximate future cost. The questions of how the damage entailed thereby might be determined need not be considered. Suffice it to say that the proof is wholly lacking to support any claim of fraud. The owner's president was a practical builder, yet he personally approved of each estimate. Fraud has not been established and the counterclaims are dismissed.

"Plaintiff's contention that the 10 per cent for general conditions meant a charge to cover the general administrative overhead incurred with the doing of extra work seems more logical. Many absurd situations would occur if the construction contended for by the defendant were followed. On the other hand, the allowance of 10 per cent as a charge for overhead, plus the 6½ per cent for commissions would not, as the defendant contends create a double charge or be an exorbitant or unusual one."

FINDS MONEY TIGHT IN MORTGAGE FIELD

Austen P. Fox Cites Difficulties Encountered by Bronx Builders.

Maintenance of a ready market for first mortgage realty bonds on the Real Estate Securities Exchange or other sales mediums is urged by Austen P. Fox, president of Austen P. Fox & Co., mortgage bankers, as the solution of many of the financing problems facing property owners and builders.

Speaking at a meeting of the Property Owners' Association last week at 1 East Tremont Avenue, the Bronx, with a view to organization of a holding company for the combined holdings of a group of property holders, Mr. Fox explained that the object was "to keep their investments from being swept away because of the tight mortgage market."

"It is not fair to be led into a state of optimism by a number of flowery-worded slogans that money is easier and that real estate will have its best year this year," he said. "In Bronx County three years or so ago owners and builders got all the mortgage money they asked for, and in many instances more than they asked for if they would pay for it. Today these mortgages are expiring, and builders are scurrying about for renewals or new mortgages and find that even though they may have reduced their mortgages through amortizations during recent years, they are unable to get an amount anywhere near the sum due, and in some instances are unable to get any mortgage. They even offer unusual bonuses, but if they do not accept what is offered to them the consequence is foreclosure.

"This same situation exists to a degree in Manhattan also, where property is considered 'prime' for loaning and renting purposes; and a similar condition is found in the other boroughs and adjoining counties. Title companies hold many unsold mortgages and foreclosed properties.

"Investors who would like to buy guaranteed mortgages and mortgage certificates are backward in doing so, because they have learned that frequently there is no ready market for these securities in case they must borrow or sell on short notice.

"If some of our large companies would pay as much attention to maintaining a market for their securities as they are doing in selling them and would lend against them liberally or buy them back when necessary, such obligations would not be thrown on the open markets at discounts to yield as high as 10 per cent, and thereby drive investors to other fields, and much more money would be available from small buyers.

"We must not look for money at the present time for less than 6 per cent, and the quicker we get together on this basis the sooner will relief come."
